THE OLD AND THE NEW YEAR.

THE "old year," for such is now that annus mirabilis of 1851, which but a few days ago was present with us, will occupy an important place in the history of Europe. The events which marked its progress were not many, but they were great; and their influence will be widely felt in the year which has commenced. It was not only a year of "wars and rumours of wars," of civil strife and social convulsion, but it was a year to be rendered famous to all time for the great example of international goodwill and generous rivalry of art and industry which it afforded, and of which the beneficial effects will in all probability be long felt throughout Europe and America.

Yet, in this remarkable year, the attention of the world was chiefly directed to two nations. Great Britain and France, if they did not monopolise either the hopes or the fears of the world, yet occupied a large share of both. While continental Europe presented the appearance of one vast camp, where upwards of one million and a half of soldiers were maintained by the three great powers of the Centre and the North, ready for warfare, civil or foreign, but chiefly directed against the real or supposed discontent of their own subjects; and while France, in a still more remarkable manner, witnessed the evolutions and dreaded the revolutions of large bodies of armed men, Great Britain, the teacher of the nations, drew together still larger assemblages, for objects wholly dissimilar. Eighteen hundred and fifty-one was a year of crowds, of masses, and of multitudes. Everywhere there was marching and countermarching; a running to and fro, and a gathering together. But while throughout the continent of Europe a countless array of bayonets glittered in the sun, and while the very strength and marrow of the nations were withdrawn from the pursuits of industry to prop the falling power of half-exploded systems, governments, and dynasties, there were no bayonets to glitter in the sun of England—no armies to show the pomp and circumstance of military dominion. We had nothing to glitter in our sun but the Crystal Palace; and our only multitudes were those orderly, quiet, intelligent, and wondering crowds of poor and rich which thronged in such marvellous numbers to view the unparalleled treasures of an unparalleled structure. In this country the year was truly one of happy augury. It was a year in which food was abundant, when there was no willing hand obliged to remain idle for want of well-paid labour; and when, safe from all the political convulsions of less advanced and less fortunate states, Englishmen had nothing to do but to attend to their business, and to prosper. The only variations in the even current were the pleasant ones connected with the rise and [illegible] ress of the Great Exhibition; and those less pleasant but [illegible] ghly necessary ones consequent upon the exercise of [illegible] supreme Britannic privilege, "the right to grumble" a[illegible] load of taxation, and to badger an unwilling M[illegible] to afford relief. As a nation we ought, indeed, to [illegible] ateful to the Great Controller of events for the mercy and [illegible] our which He has shown us, when we cast a retrospective glance upon [illegible] growing trade—that's a diminishing amount of pauperism and crime—with an increase of the national resources consequent upon each successive reduction or abolition of imposts that impeded the free action of trade and industry—and with the liberty of speech and printing, and complete security under the shelter of the law enjoyed by no other country in the Old World, and by only one other in the New, which itself derived all its liberties from us,—we may well indulge in a sentiment of pardonable satisfaction when we compare our condition with that of our neighbours. Constitutional liberty, the great desire of all intelligent nations, the paramount necessity of our civilisation, remains the heritage of the people and race who first imagined it, first struggled or it, and first obtained it. No other has as yet been able to reach, or at all events to consolidate, it; and the only spot in the Eastern hemisphere where the political exile is safe from the vengeance or the molestation of the pursuer, and the only place where a man may openly say and openly print and publish what he thinks, is Great Britain. The only spot in all the wide surface of the globe where it was possible without danger of any kind to hold the Great Exhibition of the Arts and Industry of all nations, was in the world's metropolis. There was a lesson of peace and good-will to be taught in 1851; and, if this country had not been in a position to teach it, the lesson would not have been read, and the world would have wanted for some years yet to come the example of, and the stimulus to, good which it afforded. For this, also, it is our duty to be thankful—not in the spirit of vanity and exultation, but with deeper and more reverential feelings, and with an earnest desire to merit, individually and collectively, the rare privilege of a wise liberty, and of the peaceful blessings which flow from it.

The neighbouring realm of France, which, next to ourselves, but possibly in a more constant manner, has excited the attention of the world during the year which has just expired, offers in its history a remarkable contrast to our own. The French are a great, a generous, and a noble-minded people. They have struggled long to imitate the example we set them, and to found a fabric of constitutional right. But their struggle has been no less arduous than vain. They have continually defeated themselves by their own impatience. They are impulsive, more than rational. They cannot argue as Englishmen can, for with their ardent vivacity the blow invariably follows the word. The opponent whom they cannot convince, they knock down. The edifice which they cannot mend in a month, they destroy in a second. Hence their constant and deplorable failures. They cannot, and will not, wait. As the child digs up the seed which it sowed yesterday, to see whether it has grown, so our neighbours, striving to anticipate the slow and sober growth of political institutions, root them up before they have taken a hold upon the soil, and all their work has to be done again. So has it been a score of times since the memorable year 1789; and, after all their chivalrous and noble efforts, they have arrived no further in 1852 than at a pure despotism. At the commencement of the old year, the result, though not by means of its accomplishment, was clearly foreseen; and the new year opens under a new system, of which the progress will be watched with the keenest anxiety in every part of Europe. One fact, however, begins to be apparent, and, when we reflect upon the troubled history of the French people for the last sixty years, the fact is both touching and suggestive in itself, and full of hope for the future welfare of an ingenious and gallant people. France has suffered so grievously from political changes—she has lost so much by wars and by revolution—that she has become sick at heart of theories and theorists, of constitutions and constitution-mongers, and longs for nothing so ardently as for peace and quietness, and liberty to extend her trade and to follow her business. The extraordinary number of suffrages which has confirmed the President in his office, after an invasion of popular rights as daring in itself as it was unprecedented in history, shows how paramount the idea has become; for it would pass credibility to be told that the seven millions of adult Frenchmen who have recorded their votes in favour of Louis Napoleon have done so because he committed a despotic act, or because they saw in him the representative of that principle of military glory which has been the bane of France and of Europe. The French are a military people; but the seven millions of men who maintain Louis Napoleon in his present place are proved to have supported him more from the dread of a desperate civil war in the year now about to commence, than with any view of foreign aggression. The disclosures of the last week show that it was more from fear of one another than from hostility to Europe that the French have so unanimously acquiesced in a military coup d'état. The world will see in due time whether their acquiescence will be of long duration, or whether the proverbial impulsiveness and impatience of the national character will not find a vent against the system which for the time being they are contented to hail as their deliverer from the dreaded evils of an exaggerated and, we believe, a fabulous anarchy.

It must be confessed that 1852 does not open with the clear, unclouded sky, and brilliant prospects of its predecessor. There are clouds upon the horizon which betoken storm, if not hurricane; and, if there be not fear among the magnates of the earth, there is at least perplexity. This country, however, has but little to dread. If we have no allies among the potentates of Europe, we shall prove to be sufficient for ourselves; and should there be danger, we have friends in the heart of every despotic state. The hard-working multitudes of all countries cannot but be the friends of England and of English ideas. But, should all European friends fail us, there would remain the new alliance now assuming shape and consistency—the most glorious alliance ever formed between nations since the world began—the alliance of Great Britain and the United States of America. That would, indeed, be a great event to grow out of the troubles and dangers of the Old World; and it is one which is not only possible, but probable.

TWELFTH-NIGHT IN FRANCE.

"THE KING DRINKS!"

Now, now the mirth comes
With the cake full of plums,
Where bean 's the King of the sport here;
Beside, we must know,
The pea, also,
Must revel as Queene in the Court here.

Begin then to chuse,
This night as ye use,
Who shall for the present delight here;
Be a King by the lot,
And who shall not
Be Twelfe-day Queene for the night here.—HERRICK.

WHAT the quaint old lyrist of the seventeenth century has embalmed in the amber of his verse, a clever artist of our own day—Tony Johannot—has pictured upon the preceding page. It is a right festal scene of the commemoration of Twelfth-night in France—a custom which has survived the Empire itself; although at the end of the year 1792 the Council-general of the Commons at Paris passed an arrêt, in consequence of which "La Fête de Rois" (Twelfth-day) was thenceforth to be called "La Fête du Sansculottes." Let us hope that subsequent revolutions have spared this convivial custom; that the coup d'état of last month will not stay the festivities of next Tuesday; and that many such a party as Tony Johannot has here pictured, may be found in every quarter of Paris.

The sacred and legendary lore of Twelfth-night—the drawing of a person, King or Queen, by a bean, found in a piece of divided cake, is well known. Hence he is called, in France, the "Roi de la Fève!" and drinks to the company, while he is saluted in mock dignity with "Le Roi boit" (the King drinks). Jordaens has painted a fine picture of the Flemish commemoration. In France the custom is many centuries old; for among the cries of Paris, of the thirteenth century, is mentioned Beans for Twelfth-day (Garstel a feves orrois crier). It is still a favourite festival with every class in France, as the confectioners attest, with their tasteful display of cakes; and not a family dinner-table can dispense with the obligato fève, the fortunate drawer of which is saluted with the loyal exclamation, "Le Roi boit;" as we see in the family circle of Tony Johannot, though they lack the picturesque costume of Jordaens' party.

In some parts of France the Bean-King is elected by another process. A child is placed under the table, where he can see nothing; and the master of the feast, holding up a piece of cake, demands whose portion it is to be. The child replies according to his own fancy, and this game continues till the piece which contains the bean had been allotted. A whole court is thus formed, the fool not being forgotten; and every time either of their Majesties is seen to drink, the company are bound to cry out, under pain of a forfeit, "The king (or Queen) drinks"

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

PARISIANA.

THURSDAY, JAN. 1, 1852.

Paris is certainly the most extraordinary capital in the world; nobody can deny that within the last week or two it has passed through a crisis of the most terrible description, yet it is now in all the glories of the masquerade, the great artery of our Boulevards having been suddenly transformed into the semblance of an English country fair. Imagine the immense length of Boulevard extending from the Church of the Madeleine to the Bastile, lined with open booths at each side, in which are displayed all kinds of cheap toys, hardware, haberdashery, children's books, confitures, in short, every article that can be named, and are all sold at a price of almost incredible cheapness, these goods being, like Peter Pindar's razors, "made to sell." This kind of open air sale takes place annually at the approach of the new year, but the number of itinerant marchands present on this occasion far exceeds anything within recollection. The weather being favourable, the Boulevards are crowded, and every booth seems to find customers. An Englishman visiting Paris for the first time would imagine himself carried back to London as it was a couple of centuries ago, when Temple-bar and Fleet-street were lined with open shops or booths, and every passer-by clamorously assailed to purchase. The great display on the Boulevards is by night, when every little boutique being throwly lighted up, the brilliancy and movement of the scene has the most picturesque and fairy-like effect.

In the meantime the exhibitions of works of art, statuettes, and ingenious toys, some of the most wonderful specimens of skilful workmanship, comprising everything that comes under the head of a New Year's gift, of which Giroux in the Rue du Coq, and Susse in the Place de la Bourse, possess a kind of monopoly, are crowded to excess by a higher order of customers. Some of the articles at these establishments may justly be termed gems of art.

Though trade and commerce are unquestionably reviving, private fortunes, severely shaken by the disasters of the Revolution of 1848, are still compelled to reduce their expenditure. This forced economy operates unfavourably upon the resources of the fine arts, so limited, of our private picture collections. Under the ancien régime, the great families of France, such as the Montmorencys, the Rohans, the Coucis, &c., possessed magnificent galleries, which were broken up in 1789 by the abolition of the law of primogeniture, as by the expropriations consequent upon the Revolution. In 1787 there were still twenty-nine collections of the first order in Paris, of which but two or three are in existence at present. So numerous were the sales of works of art at that period, that it was found necessary to institute a body of special auctioneers, the commissaires priseurs. At present, to facilitate the division of property, the number of sales has considerably increased, and the sale-rooms in the Rue des Jeuneurs frequently contain collections of pictures of immense value. Since three years, among the many treasures of art that have changed hands in those rooms, are the galleries collected by the Orleans family, by M. Debruges, Dumenil, M. Giroux, &c. During the past year alone no less than three thousand pictures were exported into England. Two important sales of pictures took place this week: the first collection was the property of the well-known amateur, Baron Sylvestre, who died about a month ago; the importance of the sale had drawn together a vast number of connoisseurs, several of whom became purchasers to a large amount. An English gentleman, Mr. Farrer, after a long contest, was adjudged for 820 francs a head of St. Michael, a study by Raphael for his well-known picture of "St. Michael overthrowing Satan." This piece had been in the possession of the Sylvestre family for 200 years. Mr. Rawson, an Englishman, also secured "Portrait" by Ribeira, 375 francs; four studies by Watteau, 775 francs. D. Teniers' picture of "Witches at the Sabbath" was knocked down to M. Pillot for 2205 francs. The other collection, the property of M. Cottreau, consisted chiefly of works by Dutch and Flemish masters. The pictures in this sale were chiefly the same as at the preceding one. Mr. Rawson buying for 210 francs an "Itinerant Dentist," by Lucas, of Leyden; and a "Farm-yard," by Ostade, for 700 francs. Terburg's "Portrait of William the Third" was adjudged to M. Pialot for 1040 francs; and a small piece by Paul Potter, "Dog watching Game," for 1360 francs. Landscape by Ruysdael and D. Teniers were knocked down for 2200 francs and 1860 francs respectively, to an agent acting, it was reported, for an English nobleman. From this brief apperçu the importance of these galleries may be estimated. You will also see that the finest pieces are in the possession of English gentlemen, French amateurs being unable, from want of means, to do more than enter the lists with them at the auction-room.

Musically this is looked on as the dullest season in the year. The Italiens have given us no novelty; but Alboni and Gassier continue their successes in Semiramide; but after the holidays, which are of very brief duration here, we are promised "Maris di Roban," with Ferlotti, Gussco, and Mdme. Florentini. At the Grand Opera, M. Gounod's "Sapho" has been revived; but though it has undergone considerable abridgement, it does not seem destined ever to become a favourite. It is well supported by Gueymard and Mdlle. Masson. At the Opéra National a new work by Boieldieu is announced, under the title of "La Butte des Moulins." The other theatres have displayed greater activity: the Porte St. Marin has opened its door under a new management, with a fantastic drama by Mery and Gerard de Nerval, in which Laurent Janszoon, the inventor of printing, according to the Dutch, is persecuted by his Satanic Majesty, who, however, is ultimately overcome. This affair is entitled "L'Imagier de Haarlem," and its success was complete. At the Ambigu the "Vampire," by Messrs. Lemaas and Maquet, attracts in crowds the lovers of the fantastic; virtue is impersonated at the Gaietés, as "Jeanne la Fileuse"—an extremely heavy affair, which met with but an indifferent reception; while, at the Gymnase, per contra, "Les Incertitudes de Rosette," a merry trifle, has made a decided hit. Such, in a few words, is our last theatrical budget.

As all the world in London, as in Paris, eats oysters, it may not be uninteresting to mention that, on Friday last, the sale at the halle aux huitres of these succulent bivalves actually reached 396,000! The market is provisioned twice a day by the railways from the coast.

The Charivari is beginning to recover its spirits; in reproducing the accounts given of the hospitable treatment of the prisoners arrested on the 2nd December, it says that they were abundantly supplied with provisions of all kinds, a good deal too much of Ham.

FRANCE.

An overwhelming majority of the electors exercising the right of universal suffrage has raised Louis Napoleon to the dictatorship of the French Republic. According to the report of the Consultative Commission, to whom the duty of counting the suffrages was assigned, the number of voters returned in favour of Louis Napoleon, amounts to no less than 7,439,216, while the negative votes are 640,737, the total number of votes registered being 8,079,953. This result is regarded as a great victory by Louis Napoleon, who, after the usage of the Emperor when he obtained a victory in the field, has celebrated the occasion with grand religious ceremonies, and with pomp and triumph, partaking of Imperial state in their character.

According to the directions prescribed in decrees issued on the subject, the official announcement of the result of the election was made to the President of the Republic on Wednesday evening in a solemn and impressive manner, after which it was promulgated in every commune of the Republic. The chief towns of the departments celebrated the event by a fête on Thursday, the 1st inst., when a "Te Deum" was chanted in all the churches; and on the 11th the communes are to do the same. In Paris, the religious ceremonies in honour of the occasion were celebrated in the Metropolitan Cathedral of Notre Dame, and were of a most imposing and magnificent character. All the old flags of the Empire, with tricolour standards, were displayed upon the occasion. The music composed for the coronation of the Emperor was executed by a choir of instrumental and vocal performers, numbering eight upwards of 300. At the close of the service, Louis Napoleon proceeded to the Tuileries, where in the character of President of the Republic he held a grand reception, very nearly resembling an Imperial or Royal levee. All the constituted authorities, the chief magistrates of the departments and communes, and the civil and military authorities, were present at this most imposing ceremonial.

In the morning, at ten o'clock, a salute of ten guns for [each million of affirmative votes given to the President was fired from the esplanade of the Invalides. In the evening the public edifices were illuminated, and the President gave an official reception to the corps diplomatique, the clergy, and the consistories.

With respect to the forthcoming new Constitution, various rumours and speculations as to its provisions were afloat during the week. It is to be founded on the Consular Charter, or Act, which was given to France by Napoleon in the year 1800, called the year VIII. of the old Republic.

According to the prevalent statements on the subject, the Senate will be composed of 150 members, chosen among Frenchmen possessing an income of 25,000f. per annum, or, in default of this qualification, having rendered distinguished services to the State. The latter are to receive a salary of 25,000f. per annum. The attributions of the Senate are to be as nearly as possible those of the Senate of the Empire; its debates will not be open to the public.

The legislative body is to be composed of 250 members only; each electoral arrondissement is to choose three members, among whom the Executive will select one as legislator. Hence there would be 750 candidates elected, of whom 250 would be appointed. Nothing is yet decided as to the degree of publicity to be given to the debates of the Legislative body.

Legislation by decree is still exclusively carried on by the Executive. Amongst the latest decrees are one uniting the administrations of the Customs and the indirect contributions, and placing M. Leterrin, the present Director of the Customs, at the head of both departments; also a decree founded upon a report from the Minister of War on the subject of the military divisions into which France is to be divided, by which the whole of the French territory is divided into 21 military divisions (as in the time of Louis Philippe) and 86 sub-divisions; a decree declaring that no café, cabaret, or other place for the sale of liquors to be consumed on the premises, can be opened in future without the previous permission of the authorities, and that establishments of that kind already existing can be closed by order of the prefect, as a measure of public security—persons opening cafés without authority to be punished with fine and imprisonment; a decree regulating the premiums to be given to vessels engaged in the cod fishery; a decree dissolving the Chamber of Commerce of Havre, which had disapproved of Louis Napoleon's coup d'état; and a decree enacting new pains and penalties against persons attempting to destroy telegraphs, or to interrupt the communications by them.

Of the political prisoners now detained at Sainte Pelagie are divided into three categories, as follows:—1. Those who were arrested at their houses between five and six o'clock in the morning of the 2d, viz. MM. Nadaud, Greppo, Valentin, and Charles Lagrange. 2. Those who were arrested at the Mairie of the 10th arrondissement: MM. Joret, Paulin Limayrac, Teilhard-Latérisse, Antony Thouret, Pascal Duprat, Latrade, Besse, Renaud, and Marc-Dufraisse. 3. Those who have been arrested since the 2d inst.; MM. Belin, Cholat, Richardet, Burgard, Gambon, Colfavrn, Labouluye, Racouchot, Delbetz, Chaix, Pergidier, Faure, Benoît, Madet, Huguenin, and Lafond.

The sham of maintaining the Republican inscription, "Liberty! equality! fraternity!" under present circumstances, has appeared so very glaring to the Prefect of the department of Allier (one of the lately disturbed districts), that he issued the following decree, dated the 10th ult.:—

Whereas political inscriptions, and particularly the words "liberty," "equality," and "fraternity," which figure on most of the public buildings, present no character of utility, but are, on the contrary, for the people a perpetual excitement to revolt by holding up to them the emblem and recollection of a triumphant insurrection; whereas the same may be said of the trees, called "of liberty," which obstruct our public squares and walks, and are now dried up and decayed stocks, the Prefect decrees:—

"Article 1. Every political inscription, without exception, and in particular the words 'liberty,' 'equality,' 'fraternity,' shall be immediately removed from the fronts of all public edifices and private dwellings. The trees of liberty shall be cut down or rooted up.

"Article 2. Trees which, having grown luxuriantly, are an ornament to the commune, are alone to be excepted."

UNITED STATES.

The intelligence from New York this week is dated the 20th ult. Kossuth and his speeches still continued almost the sole topic of interest. At Washington Mr. Seward's resolution welcoming the Magyar chief to the country and the capital passed the Senate by a vote of 33 to 6, and the House of Representatives by a vote of 131 to 16. On this point the New York Evening Express says:—

"The President will send the resolution of Congress to Kossuth, accompanied by a letter written in the spirit of the resolution itself. The guest will be permitted to address Congress, if he desires to do so, and it is intended to appoint a committee of each House to receive and introduce Kossuth on his visiting the capital. It is also contemplated to give him a dinner—the expense to be defrayed out of the tickets. In the Senate, on the 16th, a committee of three was ordered to wait on Kossuth, on his arrival in Washington, and invite him to the chamber of that august body.

The New York Herald of the 17th ult. says:—

We are informed that a special messenger was despatched from Washington last night, by the President, to invite Kossuth to the national capital under the joint resolutions of welcome passed by the two Houses.

Deputations, invitations, public dinners, &c., were daily crowding upon the Hungarian hero, who, during the frenzy of popularity which his visit has called up for the nonce, is in a fair way of being "killed with kindness." His health, which at best is not strong, is described as being much enfeebled by the excessive labour imposed upon him of receiving and responding to the numerous addresses pouring in from almost every town and association in the American Union. He had already made upwards of twenty-six set orations since his arrival in New York. On the 11th ult. a grand banquet was given to his honour at the Irving-house by the corporation of New York. The speech of Kossuth on this occasion was said to be his masterpiece. It developed in the clearest manner his views and expectations regarding the course of the United States in reference to intervention in Hungarian affairs.

A grand banquet given him by the bar was held on the 19th. On the 22d Kossuth was to leave for Washington.

Various reports were rife at New York relative to the arrise likely to be taken by the Russian and Austrian Ministers, in consequence of the official reception of Kossuth by Congress. It was stated that their passports were to be demanded; but nothing positive had transpired.

Large donations in aid of Hungary continue to be forwarded to Kossuth, and various plans are mooted in the papers for facilitating the collection of the subscriptions and augmenting their amount.

From California accounts had been received by the Daniel Webster to the 16th November, which was the bearer of 1,000,000 dollars in gold dust, and conveyed the information that 2,000,000 dollars more were on their way from Panama.

At Marysville and Sonora many murders had taken place. The Marysville Herald states that sixteen dead bodies had been found in one week. The vigilance committee had made several arrests.

A smart shock of an earthquake, which lasted five minutes, had been felt at San Francisco.

Of general news there is nothing calling for notice.

The Christiana treason trial, for the rescue of the fugitive slaves, in which the owner was killed, has ended in the acquittal of Hanway, and the withdrawal of all the other indictments.

The Forrest divorce case was still proceeding, and likely to occupy several days. Mr. Forrest himself had been examined.

INDIA AND CHINA.

Advices by extraordinary express, in anticipation of the overland mail, bring intelligence this week from Bombay to December 2, and Calcutta to Nov. 27, by which we learn that the military expedition against the Momund tribes, under Sir Colin Campbell, had proved successful in all its undertakings, but the enemy still continued their resistance. The entire Mooltan force had been directed to be prepared for moving at a moment's notice, along the line of the frontier, after the mountaineers, it was presumed, who had been annoying our outposts.

The Ameer Dost Mahomed Khan was not dead, as reported by the last mail; but his decease was shortly expected, he being so exceedingly ill that not the slightest hope was entertained of his recovery. Maharajah Chelak Singh, the ruler of Cashmere, was also apparently in the last stage of existence, suffering greatly from dropsy.

The expedition to the Burmese Empire to demand reparation for the wrongs inflicted upon British subjects at Rangoon, sailed from Calcutta on the 15th Nov., under the command of Commodore Lambert, R.N. It consisted of her Majesty's ships Fox and Serpent, with the Hon. Company's war-steamers Tenasserim and Proserpine.

The riots among the Mahomedans and Parsees at Bombay have not been entirely suppressed; many persons have sustained serious injuries, one having died.

The Right Rev. Dr. Harding was formally installed as Bishop of Bombay, in the Cathedral there, on the 30th Nov., before one of the largest congregations ever assembled within its walls.

From China we learn, that on the 2d Dec. an alarming fire broke out in the storehouses of the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company at Mazagon, which destroyed property to the amount of nearly £20,000.

The Friend of China says, upon private authority, that the Emperor of China had abdicated his throne in favour of the usurper Tien Teh.

APPOINTMENTS TO OFFICES.—On Thursday the Act of Parliament to simplify the forms of appointments to offices and the manner of passing grants under the Great Seal (14 and 15 Vict., cap. 82) came into force, repealing the statute 27 Henry 8, c. 11, by which all writings to be passed under the Great Seal were passed through the offices of the Clerks of the Signet and Privy Seal; whereby, in every case where any gift or grant is required to be passed, her Majesty may, by her warrant to the Lord Chancellor, cause letters patent to be passed, which warrant shall be a sufficient authority for passing the same, and no Queen's bill, Signet bill, or Privy Seal bill shall be necessary to the passing of such letters patent. The offices of clerks of the Signet and Privy Seal are by the act abolished, and compensation is to be given to the present holding the offices. The duties of the Signet-office (not superseded by this act) are to be performed in the office of the Secretary of State. The Treasury is to regulate the fees of Privy Seal offices, and to fix salaries. Rules are to be made for preventing [illegible] as if they arose out of real property, which [illegible] tax as now levied. The principle [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

THE CHATEAU OF VINCENNES.

FORT VALERIEN.

THE REVOLUTION IN FRANCE.

THE accompanying Illustrations show the localities of a few of the leading incidents in the recent coup d'état in Paris and the departments of France.

The Château of Vincennes, about a league east of Paris, was the prison to which were conveyed several of the persons arrested early in the struggle. Vincennes has been for seven centuries a place of historical interest, and for nearly a century and a half the Castle has been a state prison. Mirabeau was confined in it from 1777 to 1780. In 1804 the unfortunate Duke d'Enghien was shot there by order of Napoleon, and buried in the southern ditch of the fortress; but the body was removed to the chapel in 1816. Prince Polignac and other Ministers of Charles X. were confined there after the Revolution of 1830; and we need scarcely repeat how the châteaux and chasseurs of Vincennes occur in the records of the recent revolution. The castle had formerly nine towers, eight of which were demolished in 1818. It has for some time past been used as the central depôt of artillery for the garrison of Paris, and has been put in a state of complete defence, great alterations being made in consequence of the fortification of the capital.

Fort Valérien was the prison of M. Thiers; it is the citadel of the fortifications of Paris, and the most imposing of all the forts. Our views now shift to the scenes of the struggle in the Departments.

Digne, the chief town of the Basses Alpes, on Christmas-day, was in the hands of 5000 troops, with ten pieces of artillery. The news of the coup d'état arrived here on the night of the 5th ult., and in less than two hours afterwards the leading men of the Republican party, Jourdan, Buisson, Cotte, Barneaud, and some dozen others, formed themselves into a provisional government, and issued proclamations calling the department to arms. The appeal was first put up in manuscript, and the tocsin was at once sounded; but before midnight printed appeals, signed by the chieftains of the rising, were circulated in the remotest parts of the Basses Alpes by mounted express. About two o'clock on the morning of the 6th, almost the whole adult male population of Digne was in arms, and the streets were lighted by innumerable torches borne by men, women, and even children, whose universal cry was, "To arms in defence of the Republic!" mingled with cries of "Vive Cavaignac!" "Vive l'Assemblée Nationale!" "Vive la Constitution!" The tocsin still sounded, and the National Guards, appearing, ranged themselves with the people to the cry of "Vive la République!" The gendarmerie ran to the prefecture, where they barricaded themselves, but to no purpose, for in a few minutes it was summoned by Buisson, who, with another of the chiefs, appeared at the head of a company of the civic troops. Without the least hesitation, the prefecture was placed at the disposal of the Provisional Government. Towards morning the country people, who had been summoned during the night by the mounted couriers, came in thousands, armed with muskets, pistols, and swords, headed by the chiefs of the various villages; and at noon Digne had an armed force of some 60,000. The majority of the gendarmerie willingly resigned their arms; and those who shut themselves up in a small barrack were summoned, and, having surrendered, were at once disarmed. The country people entered the town with three days' provisions, and the Provisional Government issued paper money in the name of the Republic, as a means of payment to the tradespeople for the supplies necessary for such of the people as had not the means of paying. * * * * The whole of the 10th, in Digne, was spent in attending to the wounded, and the insurgents bivouacked in the streets and the neighbouring fields, without any sign of the threatened attack from the troops said to have been on their march from the Higher Alps.

DIGNE, DEPARTMENT OF THE LOWER ALPS.

Sisteron. A letter from this place of the 10th says: "A band of insurgents, coming from Dauphiné, was vigorously repulsed by the guns of the citadel. It dispersed before crossing the bridge over the Durance, to proceed to Digne. The offices of the receivers were saved from pillage by the energy and courage of some men of order, and particularly of the authorities who are in the citadel. The insurgents, commanded by Buisson of Manosque, went to the Mairie and demanded the heads of three hundred notables of the country, and the pillage of the place for three hours; but the energy of the commandant of the citadel, who threatened to bombard them, and the obstinate refusal of the Mairie to agree to such barbarous orders, disheartened the rioters, and Buisson, after vainly attempting to succeed in his object, by proposing to place in the front rank all the women in the town, in order to deter the commandant of the citadel from performing his duty, departed for Digne. 300 troops and a brigade of gendarmerie have just passed this place, en route for Digne * * * All the department of the Basses Alpes is in the power of the Socialists. The mails are stopped, and the couriers searched. The despatches are opened, and all those addressed to public functionaries confiscated. More than 4000 insurgents have invested the chef lieu, Digne. About 2000 men from the rural communes are at Sisteron, endeavouring to take possession of the citadel, which is only guarded by 80 men. The municipal authorities have been compelled to resign their functions, and a Socialist commission is sitting at the Hôtel de Ville. The sub-prefect and all the authorities have entered the citadel. The insurgents are all armed. The town has all the appearance of a place taken by assault. The Government has received intelligence of what has taken place and is adopting energetic measures for the repression of the insurrection."

Clamecy was the focus of the insurrection, thus described in the following details of the affair given by the Constitutionnel:—"In the night of the 8th a band of several hundred insurgents, armed with muskets, scythes, and clubs, penetrated into the town of Clamecy. The National Guard were taken by surprise, but, nevertheless, assembled, and, united to the gendarmerie, opposed a vigorous resistance. Their efforts were vain, as they were numerically too weak to drive back the insurgents, who became complete masters of the town, and barricaded every street, so that no one could either enter or leave it. Some of them sounded the tocsin in order to raise the country, while others went to the sub-prefecture, which was pillaged and devastated. All the houses in the town were sacked, and a number of the inhabitants assassinated. On receiving intelligence of these events, the Prefect of the department and General Pellion proceeded to the spot; they had with them a sufficient force to keep the insurgents in awe, but unfortunately not enough to make an immediate attack on the town. They were compelled to send for reinforcements to the neighbouring garrisons. The authorities and the troops took a position on the heights which command the town, where they waited until they were prepared to make an assault on it."

TAKING DOWN THE HOUSE OF THE LATE NATIONAL ASSEMBLY.

Early in the coup was commenced the demolition of the temporary building in which the Legislative Assembly used to sit; and its removal has been rapidly proceeded with. The furniture was first carried away, openings were then made in the side walls, and the roof was next taken down. The only entrance then used was that in the Rue de l'Universite, communicating with the hotel of the President of the Assembly.

"Of the late National Assembly (says the Times correspondent's letter of Friday week)—the theatre of so many passionate appeals, of so much fruitless wisdom and barren eloquence—only four bare walls are now left standing; and in a few days even these will completely disappear. It is known that the erection was temporary, and intended only to last three months, instead of more than three years. It was constructed almost entirely of wood, plaster, and canvas, with very little masonry. Workmen are still employed in removing all traces of the building, which, indeed, was a deformity to the fine palace of which it was the appendage. I passed near the spot to-day, and in the courtyards I found artillery-men sauntering about, or cleaning their guns, and the workmen, throwing about the fragments of the bureaux and the benches, did so with very little compunction—quite as little as the gravedigger in 'Hamlet' manifests at tossing about the relics of perhaps as mighty men."

THE CENSORSHIP IN PARIS.

The above Sketch represents a scene of daily and hourly occurrence in Paris since the memorable 2d of December. Paris being in a state of siege, the liberty of the press is suspended, and no newspaper, pamphlet, book, or even handbill, is allowed to be published until it has undergone revision in a department in the office of the Ministry of the Interior known as "La Police des Journaux." Every printer is compelled to send two copies of the proof sheets of the newspaper or other work which he prints or publishes to this office, one copy of which is returned to him after such erasures as the censors may think proper, with the necessary imprimatur affixed upon it, and the other is retained by the Ministry as a check upon the printer. The scene in our Engraving represents a person known in England as the "printer's devil" offering his proof sheet to the clerks, or porters, in the ante-room of the Censor for transmission to that functionary. This gagging of the press being a new thing in France, all the printers are not yet acquainted with the full force of the regulations to which they have to submit; and they sometimes send only one proof sheet, instead of two. In these instances they are dismissed without the imprimatur—the fate which befel the unhappy "devil" who is the subject of our Sketch. Louis Napoleon is reported to have declared that he will carry on his government without "journalists, philosophers, or lawyers:" but, powerful as he is, we think he will be too prudent to continue the censorship; and those who are believed to be in his confidence go so far as to say, that the moment Paris shall be declared to be no longer in a state of siege the censorship will cease. This, however, is but rumour.

"Next to the brochure of M. Granier de Cassagnac," says the Paris correspondent of the Times, "the theme most productive of abuse and derision is the censure. The members of this quorum, say my informants, perform their unenviable functions with the utmost nonchalance, smoking, drinking, and supping in the bureau. At eleven o'clock they 'shut up shop.' Any unfortunate employé who brings a complete copy of the journal to which he belongs after that hour is sent away, with the intimation that it is too late, and that he must 'call again to-morrow,' while the journal is obliged to appear the next morning with a column or two of sham advertisements to supply the place of any political articles which may have required the supervision of the 'censure.' If a morning paper reproduces any paragraph of news from the Patrie, or other papers of the preceding day, without affixing the remarks of the editor, which of course are always favourable to the President and his Government, it is not allowed to appear until the omitted commentary is added."

This Company is formed for the Manufacture of Printing Type from Metal Moulds by pressure. By this new process (which may be seen daily) wire, prepared of the proper form and gauge, is supplied in a self-acting machine, and by striking the face on the end of a die of hardened steel, and cuts it off at the required length. The type thus produced, possessing at least sixty times the durability of cast type, are made by a compression of the metal to about one half its former bulk.

The liability of shareholders is limited by deed, which also provides that a dividend of Five per Cent. per annum shall be paid to the Subscribers prior to the Patentees receiving any Royalty.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JANUARY 3, 1852.

We suppose that it will now be very generally admitted in every part of Europe, and it certainly will not be denied in France, that Louis Napoleon Bonaparte may call himself Emperor of the French, as soon as he pleases. The ceremonial which was instituted at the Tuileries and at Notre Dame, on the 1st of January—that remarkable inauguration of a new year, and, as we may call it, of a new reign—proves too clearly to admit of a further doubt, that the "Republic" doomed as it was by the successful coup d'état on the 2d of December, will, ere long, become the "Empire." There is no obstacle. The Republic only exists upon sufferance. With seven millions of voters as his back, inclusive of nearly 400,000 soldiers who yield him not only implicit, but cordial obedience, Louis Napoleon may call himself by whatever name he chooses: he has played his game, and won. His friends and supporters are already beginning to wonder why he did not, from the first, announce his intention to instal himself at the Tuileries, and decorate his shoulders with the Imperial purple. The basest and most servile flattery tracks his footsteps; and the French nation, with preposterous gratitude for being delivered from the Socialist "nightmare" that has sat upon its breast for the last twelvemonth, has yielded its dearest liberties to the man of the sword. But there are immense numbers of persons in France who expect gratitude as well as show it; and every little mayor of every little commune, who ordered a placard to be stuck on a wall in support of the President's coup d'état, has put in a claim for place, honour, and emolument. Never was there such a swarm of hungry claimants around a man as are now fastening upon Louis Napoleon. Louis Philippe's thoroughly demoralised the French, that, if Louis Napoleon wishes to purchase tools, he may have them in abundance for every kind of work, dirty or not, as may be. The new Constitution is looked for, because people have a natural curiosity to know what so remarkable a person, entrusted with such extraordinary powers, will do on so singular an occasion but no one in France seems very greatly to care whether the document be a rose or a reality, or whether its principles be the European or the Asiatic school of government. Yet the day must come when this reckless and unreasoning enthusiasm on the one side, and this indifferentism on the other will be superseded by very opposite feelings, and when a strict account will be required from the President or the Emperor—whichever he may be—of the conduct he has pursue in his new position. France must feel supreme in the first place; but, as soon as her dread of the "Red spectre" is forgotten, both France and her ruler will discover that the régime of the sword is both unsatisfactory and expensive.

SPECULATION is still rife as to the causes which produced the secession or dismissal from the Ministry of so important and celebrated a statesman as Lord Palmerston. It could serve no good purpose to reproduce any of the rumours that are current, either as regards the event itself, or the modifications in the Ministry which are likely to flow from it. The whole case will come before the public at the usual period and in the usual way. In the meantime, however, it is curious to note that the approaching fall of the Foreign Secretary was known in Austria before it was publicly known in England. A letter published in the Breslau Gazette, and dated from Vienna on the 23d of December, the day before the announcement was made in England by the semi-official journals in the confidence of the Ministry, contains the following passage, which, if not important, is certainly remarkable:—"It is rumoured here," says the writer, "that secret negotiations are going on between persons high placed in London and this Court, behind Lord Palmerston's back, the object of which is nothing less than a better understanding between the Austrian and English Courts, the first-fruits of which, it is hinted, will naturally be the fall of the English Foreign Secretary. The reception of Lord Westmoreland by the Emperor, which was immediately followed by an invitation to dinner at the Palace, is regarded as the first indication of the entente, and hopes are openly expressed that England will very shortly return to the continental system of policy." The writer explains, that by the "continental system" is not meant the introduction of military government, but "adhesion to the anti-revolutionary system which begins with the removal of political refugees, and is of a nature to give support to all measures for the suppression of the European propaganda." If the Emperor of Austria and his advisers flatter themselves that by the accession of Lord Granville to the Ministry, or by any possible change among parties or party men in this country, political exiles will no longer be allowed to live in security in England, they are not only very much mistaken in the fact, but greatly ignorant of the public opinion and feeling of this country. It is likely enough that the successful exertions made by Lord Palmerston to procure the liberation of Kossuth may have offended the Austrian Government, and that his Lordship's unlucky slips of the tongue in his address to the Irlington deputation may have filled up the measure of his iniquity in Austrian eyes; but that the future policy of the British Ministry will, in consequence of Lord Palmerston's fall, be of an Austrian character, is simply ridiculous even to suppose. There can be no extradition of political refugees from England. The very word is as foreign as the thing, and the English language, like the English law, is alike ignorant of both.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

PROPOSED BISHOPRIC OF SOUTHWARK.—A proposition will, it is said, be brought before Parliament in the ensuing session for dividing the diocese of Winchester, and establishing a separate bishopric for Southwark, which is to comprise the whole of the archdeaconry of Surrey. The church of St. Saviour, Southwark, is to be the cathedral. The diocese of Winchester at present contains 531 benefices, of which upwards of 200 will form the diocese of Southwark. The income of the new Bishop (the same as that of the Bishop of Manchester, £4000) to be paid out of the funds of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, until the next vacancy in the bishopric of Winchester, when it will be taken from the revenues of that see, the former income of which has been fixed at £8000, the new Bishop to have a seat in the House of Lords by rotation, as provided in the Manchester Bishopric Act.

CARDIFF.—This beautiful structure was reopened for divine service on Tuesday week, after having undergone an entire alteration in the internal arrangements. The old and heavy pews have been removed, and more modern and convenient ones substituted, by which 300 additional sittings are obtained, 200 of which will be appropriated to the poor. The Bishop of Llandaff preached an admirable and appropriate discourse in the morning, from Acts xvii. 10, 34; and in the evening the Rev. John Wells, vicar of Llandaff, preached from Psalm xlvii. 8. The congregations on both occasions were very large, and there was collected in the morning £67 7s. 6d., and in the evening £23 4s., exclusive of donations and promises of £25 from the Rev. T. W. Booker, Esq., M.P., who was with his family attended the morning service.

At the usual meeting of the Worcester Society for the relief of clergymen's widows and orphans, held on Monday, at Worcester, the Bishop of Worcester in the chair, it was stated that the total collection for the charity at the last Worcester festival was £1010 6s., being £9 less than in 1848. This will be divided between the three diocesan societies of Gloucester, Worcester, and Hereford, as usual on that occasion.

At the quarterly meeting of the board of the Lichfield Diocesan Church Extension Society, held on Christmas-eve, the Lord Bishop in the chair, a grant of £900 was made towards the building of the new church about to be erected at Soho, in the parish of Handsworth.

SECESSION FROM THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND.—On Sunday morning the Rev. Francis Caffe, M.A., who has been for some years past the minister of Carlisle Episcopal Chapel, Lower Kennington-lane, publicly announced from his pulpit that he had ceased to be a clergyman of the Church of England, having been for some time by his conscientious convictions disassenting in that chapel. He stated that he had left the Church of England because the doctrine of baptismal regeneration was taughtin its formularies, and held by the Prayer-book to be a fundamental principle.

THE REV. MR. BENNETT AND ST. BARNABAS.—Not twelve months ago Mr. Bennett left St. Barnabas and quitted England. His has spent eight or nine months in Roman Catholic countries, and much of the time in Rome itself. Rumour relates that the sight of Italy and Spain is not likely to detach him from the English communion. Mr. Bennett has returned to England, and he has, it is said, at the invitation of the trustees of the Marquis of Bath, accepted the living of Frome Selwood, in the diocese of Bath and Wells.

EXTENSION OF STEAM POSTAL COMMUNICATION.—The extension of postal communication by steam-vessels proposed to be established from the principal ports of the United States on the great lines of commercial traffic with Europe, Central America, and the East, has now assumed an importance which entitles it to consideration. By the official report of the Postmaster-General of the United States, we find that offers have been made by that department to the Government of Spain for a mail service from New York to Antwerp; from New York, by Gibraltar, Marseilles, and Toulon, to Genoa; from Philadelphia to Antwerp; and for the extension of the New York and Havre line to Bremen; from New York to Aspinwall, on the Nicaragua route; from Philadelphia to Havannah; from New York to New Orleans, by ocean steamers, in connexion with a contemplated railroad service across the state of Florida; from New York to Chagres, and from New York to Venezuela, by way of St. Thomas and other West India islands; from San Francisco to China and Calcutta. Other lines have been projected to the Brazils and other parts of Central and South America, but have not been submitted to the Government. As regards the line to Antwerp, it is stated that the Belgian Government is ready to co operate in their speedy establishment and in their maintenance, as they would be exceedingly advantageous to that country, not only as regards their postal intercourse, but also, in a much higher degree, as respects their commercial interests. The proposition for the establishment of a line of mail steamers between New York and Antwerp, it is said, will only be terminable at steam-ships, readily converted into war-steamers, for 160,000 dollars per annum for each ship employed, or to contract for such service, and receive for it only the postages which shall arise from such mail matter as may be accidentally transmitted in the ships of the proposed line. This proposition is recommended to the early and favourable consideration of Congress by the Postmaster-General, for the reason that it would materially lessen the time now occupied for the transmission of the mails between the United States and England, and for other cogent reasons not directly connected with its usefulness for mail purposes. The report states that, looking to the early establishment of a steam-mail line between California and China, and the Sandwich Islands, the postmaster at San Francisco has been instructed to open a mail service with those countries, by every convenient opportunity afforded by vessels employed in those seas. For the establishment of a steam mail service on this route, a bill is now before the American Congress. The extensions of steam mail service in this country are—the proposed contracts for line of steamers to Spain; the proposed mail steamers to Australia, by way of the Cape and from New York as a contemplated railroad service across the state of Florida; from New York to Aspinwall, on the Nicaragua route; from New York to Venezuela, by way of St. Thomas and other West India islands; from San Francisco to China and Calcutta. Other lines have been projected to the Brazils and other parts of Central and South America, but have not been submitted to the Government. As regards the line to Antwerp, it is stated that the Belgian Government is ready to co operate in their speedy establishment and in their maintenance, as they would be exceedingly advantageous to that country, not only as regards their postal intercourse, but also, in a much higher degree, as respects their commercial interests. For the establishment of a steam mail service on this route, a bill is now before the American Congress. The extensions of steam mail service in this country are—the proposed contracts for line of steamers to Spain; the proposed mail steamers to Australia, by way of the Cape and from New York as alternate months; a contract for the conveyance of mails to the coast of Africa; and the extension of the Indian and China service by way of the Mediterranean. The English Government, it is stated, have just agreed to accept a charter of a steam company to run vessels between Galway and Halifax.—Morning Chronicle.

LORD PALMERSTON AND LORD GRANVILLE.—One of those coincidences in which curious people are prone to indulge is to be found in the letters attached to the coat of arms of the families of Lord Palmerston and Lord Granville. The device of the ex-Secretary for Foreign Affairs is "Flecti, non Frangi," while that of the Foreign Secretary is "Frangi, non Flecti." The similarity in sound, and opposition in sense, of these two mottoes of the respective noble houses to which our late and present Foreign Secretaries be.ong, will strike at once the curious in such matters, when it is considered how these devices were selected long ago by the founders of those families, when the present events could scarcely have presented themselves to their imagination. The ingenious will further amuse themselves by making the application to the case of the accomplished nobleman, who may have "bent" to rise again, but who may not; et be "broken."

The National Public School Association are about to appoint a deputation to wait upon Lord John Russell. His Lordship, having already given an audience to the deputation appointed by the rival society—the Manchester and Salford—has consented to an interview, and has fixed the 31st of January for it.

Under [illegible] babla that Mr. Wilson Patten, M.P. for the nor... [illegible] be solicited to introduce the measure.

THE BIRMINGHAM MARKET HALL FOUNTAIN.—This fountain was opened on Wednesday, the 24th ult. (Christmas-eve), and was seen to full play. From a basin of Yorkshire sandstone, fifteen feet in diameter, and capable of containing 1000 gallons of water, rises a double plinth of sandstone, supporting a handsome pedestal of magnesian limestone, on which is placed the metal-work of the fountain, consisting of a fine bronze statue, crowning a Greek vase, and surrounded by four figures of children, emblematic of four of the principal branches of industry carried on in Birmingham—those of the gunmaker, glass-blower, die-sinker, and engineer. In antique vase, out of which the jet of water proceeds, forms what may be termed the apex of the column, the water falling into the vase being discharged into the basin below through eight apertures in so many lions' heads. Suspended from the rings attached to the pinnals of the pedestal, and resting upon the consoles, are four groups in bronze, representing the various commodities sold in the market. One of these is composed of fish, another of game, a third of vegetables, and the fourth of flowers and fruit. The group allusive to the commodities sold in the Hall is a happy thought spiritedly expressed. The metal-work alone cost £990.

THE LIVERPOOL COUNTY COURT.—Mr. Ramshay having threatened to impugn the decision of the Earl of Carlisle removing him from the office of judge of the Liverpool County Court the learned gentleman it appears is about to carry the matter to the Court of Queen's Bench, to test the validity of his removal. That was the current impression, at all events, in the Court on Monday morning, which opened at nine o'clock for the December sittings, before the newly-appointed judge, Mr. Joseph Pollock. Mr. Statham, clerk of the court, has received the following letter from Mr. Ramshay, which was in the learned gentleman's own handwriting:—"Temple, Dec. 27, 1851. Sir,—You will please to adjourn the County Court, when it shall be holden on the 29th inst., to the 27th of January, 1852; and I am to request the same to be advjournel accordingly. WILLIAM RAMSHAY, Judge of the County Court of Lancashire, holden at Liverpool." In the course of the day Mr. Wheeler, solicitor, applied to his Honor to have a case stated for the Queen's Bench, but after hearing the Honor again postponed the re-hearing of the case until after next term; and from this decision it is thought that he expects the appeal of Mr. Ramshay will come before the judges in January.

FORGERY ON THE YORKSHIRE BANK.—Several forged notes, purporting to be of this bank, were put in circulation in Leeds on Wednesday week, and also in other towns of Yorkshire about the same time. The forged notes were dated at Doncaster, December 4, 1850, signed W. Cooper, and entered Robt. Stockil, and are easily distinguishable from the genuine ones, owing to defects in engraving the capital German text "Y," the very first letter in the note, in which the lowest stroke of that letter, on the left-hand side, and the uppermost on the right hand, are omitted altogether. The numbers of such notes as have appeared are various, but are composed of the figures 2, 6, and 8, five figures being used in every instance. On the following Friday, two men, named Jones and Jackson, were committed for trial from Bradford on five separate charges of having uttered these notes, and in all, so far as can be ascertained, twenty of the notes have been passed in that town alone. In Leeds, three men, named James Ellis, Edward Marshall, and John Green, were brought up on Monday, and underwent a long examination before Ralph Markland, Esq., and C. S. Mansel, Esq., two sufficient magistrates, for uttering and passing counterfeit notes. The result of the examination was that Ellis and Marshall were committed for trial at the next York assizes, and Green was remanded to a future day, when it is expected evidence against him will also be produced.

THE LANCASHIRE EMPLOYERS OF STEAM ENGINEERS.—The great employers of labour in this department of trade in Lancashire had a meeting on Tuesday evening, at the Clarence Hotel, Manchester, at which they decided on joining, and becoming a principal member of the association in London. The meeting was attended by the representatives of more than 50 firms, and presided over by Mr. T. B. Sharp, of the firm of Sharp Brothers and Co., Manchester. The meeting appeared to be unanimous in determining to resist in every attempt at dictation on the part of the men as also injurious to employer and employed; and from the conversation that occurred, it appeared that many establishments had singly resisted such attempts, and had come off victorious, and had been successful. Some, however, had not shown sufficient firmness, and had become the slaves of their men, and submitted to the grossest tyranny, dictated by a grossly ignorant, and in some cases, drunken set of men, of sympathy with the employers under the extraordinary dictation attempted, and that though many of them are under bonds or engagements to complete machinery by a given time, their customers have signified the great readiness to extend the time on account of indulgence that may be required in the completion of their contracts.

SACRILEGE AT HOUGHAM CHURCH.—The parish church of Hougham, about three miles from Derby, was sacrilegiously entered on Christmas-eve. The thieves, no doubt, anticipated removing the plate, but this was fortunately deposited elsewhere. They carried off an iron chest, containing deeds, &c., belonging to the parish, and proceeded to break it open. They found it across a few deeds, doubtless from its heavy nature. Some books, however, were stolen.

ROBBERY WITH VIOLENCE.—In the immediate vicinity of Nottingham robberies and burglaries have of late been very frequent. On Sunday night, at half-past six o'clock, Mr. King, lace-manufacturer, of Walker-street, Sneinton, accompanied by a young lady, named Smith, was walking along the Trent-lane, a rather lonely road, about a mile from the town, and when about half-way down the lane, three hundred yards from the nearest dwelling, when a tall man, rather suspiciously attired, passed him. After the man had passed him a few yards, he gave a peculiar whistle, which was answered by another, and in a few seconds three fellows, armed with bludgeons and other weapons, rushed upon Mr. King and his companion. The young lady screamed aloud, but was quickly rendered insensible by blows from the bludgeons. Two of the ruffians attacked Mr. King, who, being unarmed and unprepared, was very soon overpowered. He offered all the money and valuables upon his person; but this not being a considerable sum, it is supposed, from the whistles, as they used the most brutal and murderous means to prevent him from giving any alarm. From the words uttered by one of the ruffians when leaving, no doubt they supposed their victims could not survive the attack. When Mr. King left Mr. King and his companion were in a shocking mutilated condition. They were both removed to Mr. King's residence, and attended by Mr. Burrows, surgeon, immediately. The lady still remains there, it being unsafe to remove her to her own house. None of the robbers have been apprehended.

FRIGHTFUL AFFAIR.—A murder of a most heinous character was committed on Saturday last, at Belper, about eight miles from Derby, and near the extensive cotton-spinning mills of Messrs. Strutt and Jedediah Strutt, Esq., residing at Lane-end, in the immediate neighbourhood. Turner collected the rents of a widow lady named Barnes, who lived with a relative, the Rev. J. Bannister, a clergyman, and curate of the Church of St. Peter, in Belper. Having been a defaulter to a considerable amount, Mrs. Barnes sent him a note the day previous, to say that he would not be allowed to collect any more rents, and that she was to consult Mr. Bannister about the matter. This note greatly exasperated him, and at eight o'clock on Saturday evening he went to a provision-shop in Belper, kept by a man named Haslam, from whom he borrowed a large carving-knife, and immediately went direct to Field-house, the deceased's residence, and asked to see Mrs. Barnes. The servant went up-stairs, and told Mrs. Barnes that Turner wished to speak to her, but she refused to grant him an interview, and the servant returned with a message to that effect. Turner said he would not go away without seeing her, and entering the house, pushed the girl aside, and rushed up-stairs. The servant, very much alarmed, ran to fetch the Rev. Mr. Bannister, who was in an adjoining building. Mr. Bannister hurried sixty run into the house, and on proceeding up-stairs met Turner coming down with the knife in his hand, which was covered with blood. Turner, after a short struggle, was precipitated down stairs. Mr. Bannister immediately proceeded into the unfortunate lady's room, where he found her lying upon the ground, with her head almost severed from her body. One of her thumbs had been cut off, as if in struggling to prevent the knife from lacerating her throat. Medical aid was immediately sent for, but life was quite extinct. Turner, after passing Mr. Bannister on the stairs, as already described, on leaving the house met the servant girl coming in, and no made an attempt to strike her with the knife, but she turned round and evaded the blow. The murderer then ran off at the top of his speed, and succeeded in escaping detection until Monday, when he was arrested in a house adjoining his own cottage. Mrs. Barnes was upwards of sixty years of age.

M. GUIZOT.—M. Brière, a publisher in Paris, brought an action before the civil tribunal against M. Didier, another publisher, to obtain damages of 70,000 francs for his having published a work by M. Guizot, called "Histoire des Origines du Gouvernement représentatif en Europe," which he alleged was only a reproduction of a work by the same author, called "Essais sur l'Histoire de France," of which he had purchased the copyright in 1832. But the tribunal thought that the "Essais" were only "Histoire des Origines" in a less developed as professor; and that the "Histoire des Origines" was an entirely different work. It accordingly dismissed the demand, and condemned M. Brière in all the costs.

The Gornale di Roma of the 20th publishes a ...ries of regulations for the introduction of postage stamps. There are to be stamps of eight different values, varying from half a baiocco to a seven baiocchi (a baiocco is about a halfpenny). The stamps represent the triple crown and the keys. Letters for the interior may or may not be prepared by means of stamps; but letters for foreign states must. In every other respect the regulations are the same as those adopted by other countries.

The Prefect of the Seine (Paris) has confided the ornamental painting which is to be executed in the Salon de l'Empereur at the Hôtel de Ville to M. Horace Vernet; that in the Salle du Zodiaque, to M. Léon Cogniet; and the Salon du Président, to M. Choppin.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

MILITARY EXAMINATION.—The Naval and Military Gazette has the following:—"It is stated that a military inspector of garrison and regimental schools is to be nominated, of such rank that his authority may not clash with the examinations of lieutenant-colonels in command of regiments. We h reason to believe that the is preparatory to arrangements for the examination of officers prior to their promotion in the rank of captain."

RECRUITING DISTRICTS.—It is supposed that, in pursuance of the recommendation of the army and ordnance committee, one of the recruiting districts will be reduced. The Coventry district will probably be the one selected for this reduction.

ARMY AND NAVY CLUB.—We understand (says the United Service Gazette) that, at a recent meeting of the committee of this club, the names of Captain Hodder and Mr. M'Geachy Allegyn (late a captain in the 89th regiment), both recently convicted of fraudulent conspiracy, were ordered to be struck out of the list of members.

THE TROOPS UNDER ORDERS FOR THE CAPE.—The service companies of the 1st battalion Rifle Brigade, under the command of Colonel Butler, embarked at Dover in the Mewers, screw steamer, yesterday, 2d of January, for the Cape of Good Hope. Drafts from the 43d, 45th, 49th, 91st, 2d battalion 73d, and 74th, and from the 1st battalions 12th and 91st Infantry, as we l as a small detachment from the dépôt of the 12th Lancers, also embarked for that colony on board the Birkenhead war-steamer. These reinforcements for service at the Cape will altogether amount to about 1200 men of all ranks. There is no foundation for the report that the 85th Regiment will proceed to the Cape. In fact, this corps is now under orders to proceed next year to Malta.

THE VACANT COLONELCY.—Lieut.-General Sir Neil Douglas, from the 72nd Regiment, will succeed to the colonelcy of the 78th Regiment, vacated by the death of General Anderson. Lieut.-General Aitchison will succeed to the colonelcy of the 72nd, vice Sir Neil Douglas.

THE SEARCH FOR SIR JOHN FRANKLIN FROM BEHRING'S STRAITS.—Later intelligence from Behring's Straits puts us in possession of a melancholy fact respecting an officer of the Enterprise searching ship. Lieut. Barnard and Mr. J. Adams, assistant-surgeon, had been left at Michaelowski, the Russian trading port in Norton Sound, in October, 1850, for the purpose of collecting information of the missing expedition from the Russian posts and from the natives inland. A voluminous report on this object, Lieut. Barnard, with an interpreter, had gone early in January to a distant post, intending to communicate, if possible, with some of the neighbouring chiefs. During the night the post was surrounded by a large body of Tchutski Indians, several of whom at once forced entered the principal dwelling and killed the Russian governor. Lieut. Barnard and the interpreter, who were in the same house, made such resistance as drove the Indians out of the house. Mr. Barnard then laid siege to the house, keeping the Indians out of the wooden stockade, stuck upright in the snow; but one of the party being soon afterwards shot, the whole retired to an Esquimaux village at the entrance of Michaelowski, proceeded with a number of Russians to the distant post, where he found the body of his late companion.

NEW STEAM NAVIGATION ACT.—On Wednesday last the new Steam Navigation Act, passed in August last, came into force; and the other acts of the same subject (9 and 10 Vict., c. 101; and 11 and 12 Vict., c. 91) are repealed. The laws relating to steam navigation are now consolidated, so that they are to be found—which is an advantage—in one statute. The act, after stating that the naval department of the Board of Trade is to assist in the survey of the survey of steam-vessels, and the number of passengers they are allowed to carry; of the build of iron steamers, of safety-valves, of boats, &c., in assigning vessels of lights and provision against accidents from collision; of the inspection of steam-vessels, and of legal proceedings, with some miscellaneous matters. On all these subjects there are various provisions to render steam navigation safe. The Board of Trade is to fix the number of passengers in all steamers; and after the 31st of March steam-vessels are required to carry safety-valves out of the control of the engineer, which valves are to be deemed a necessary part of the machinery upon which the surveyor-general is to report. This regulation is for the additional safety of the passengers.

The Government contract for 50,000 gallons rum for the navy was taken on Saturday by Messrs. Lemon, Hart, and Son, of 99, Fenchurch-street.

ELECTION INTELLIGENCE.

MONMOUTHSHIRE BOROUGHS.—As Mr. Blewitt, the present member will soon vacate his seat, on account of the position held by him as Lord-Lieutenant of Monmouthshire, Mr. Lindsay, of Llangoran-lane, Monmouth, has addressed the electors. He told them that he began life a destitute orphan boy, at sea, and at twenty had returned home commander of an Indiaman. He was a Scotch Presbyterian, and in the Scotch Church, and would support Sir Benjamin Hall in his measure for Church and State reform. He would resist the encroachments of the Church of Rome. He was for reduction of expenditure, for encouragement to the Royal dockyards and Canada. He agreed with Mr. Labouchere's views of the Navigation Laws, and was opposed to those of Mr. Labouchere. He was for real Free Trade, but would not give France privileges she denied to us. He was for the extension of the franchise to the suffrage, but not for universal voting. Sir B. Hall supported Mr. Lindsay, but was taken to task by a local elector for his interference with Newport. Mr. Crawshay Bailey, who is interested in the trade of the town, is the only candidate on the Conservative interest.

LEICESTER.—In the event of a dissolution, there will be a contest. Besides Lord Edrington and Mr. Rowndell Palmer, the members, there are two new candidates—Mr. Collier, a barrister, son of the late member, and Mr. Stark, the banker.

BLACKBURN.—Mr. M. J. Feilden, of Feniscombe, is announced as a candidate for the representation of Blackburn at the next general election.

THE ROYAL ASSOCIATION AT WINDSOR FOR ENCOURAGING THE ARTISTS—AND LABOURERS.—The noble example set by H.R.H. Prince Albert is now being followed by many of the nobility and gentry, by establishing associations to award prizes to artisans and labourers. At Windsor prizes are given to those who have brought up their families without resort to parochial relief, except in cases of sickness—to families distinguished for tidiness and cleanliness—to children who go regularly to school—to well-conducted servants or labourers, and to a few others, who have been the longest time in service. They have laid by savings for a deferred annuity—to the best cultivators of gardens or allotments—to exhibitors of the best collections of vegetables and produce, or of cottage handicraft.

LORD NORMANBY.—Galignani, of Saturday last, contradicts the statement put forth in the various journals, that the police employed in arresting Cavaignac and Changarnier on the night of the 2d of December had discovered a voluminous correspondence, in which the British Government, or its representative, Lord Normanby, had very freely recorded their admiration of the Republic, and their contempt for Napoleon. "We are enabled, says the Messager, to say that this absurd on dit the most unqualified contradiction; it is without a shadow of foundation."

LORD PALMERSTON AND THE NORTHERN POWERS.—The following extract from the lithographed foreign correspondence of the Paris office of the Associated Press and English journals with news is very curious, as it is dated the day before the announcement of Lord Palmerston's secession from office was made in the London journals:—"Vienna, Dec. 23.—Rumours are current in circles of negotiations said to have been engaged by Prince Schwarzenberg in England with our Court, without the knowledge of Lord Palmerston. Their object is said to be a rapprochement between the two Courts, and the retirement of the noble Lord from office is announced as certain to happen soon. The first token of this rapprochement has been the admission of Lord Westmoreland to an audience, and his invitation to dinner by the Emperor. There are many persons who now openly laugh loudly that Lord Palmerston, the revolutionary man, which does not mean the institution of a military Government, repugnant to the habits and tastes of the English, but her adhesion to the counter-revolutionary league will soon be commenced by the expulsion of the Hungarian refugees, and by supporting all measures that can destroy the European democratic propagandas."

BANKERS' PRIZE ESSAY.—The prize of £100, offered in January last by James William Gilbart, Esq., F.R.S., of the London and Westminster Bank, for the best essay upon the Great Exhibition, in connexion with "Practical Banking," has been awarded to Mr. Granville Sharp, accountant in the East of England Bank at Norwich.

FOUNDLING HOSPITAL.—Frederick William Pott, Esq., of Doctors'-commons, has lately added to the valuable collection of pictures in this establishment, by presenting to the governors two original portraits—those of Sir Aspley, and the other of Ben Jonson. This act of generosity and favour towards an institution of which Mr. Pott's father was an active governor, and of which he himself has been for many years a strenuous advocate, has been accepted by the governors of the hospital with great gratification.

LEGEND OF THE ROBIN REDBREAST.—The following beautiful legend of the robin redbreast, which I have just met with, was quite new to me; less that some unsavory superstition current in Scotland, where would say of the cause why the robin redbreast has always been a favourite and protégé of man. While our Saviour was bearing his cross, one of these birds, they say, took one thorn from his crown, and was dyed his breast; and ever since that time robin redbreasts have been the friends of man."—Communications with the Unseen World," p. 2.—Notes and Queries.

GOLD IN AUSTRALIA.—(Extract of a letter from Hobart Town, August 4):—"The most glad discoveries in New South Wales are the all-absorbing subject of conversation here, which is unsettling the minds of all classes nothing but "the diggings" are thought of. Any fancy one may be making a hundred per cent. on his capital, and a digger can put into his pocket to the bank, and receiving £5400 for his morning's work! If this goes on, it must unsettle the whole monetary system of the world. California has produced nothing equal to this. As soon as the news of the auriferous discovery spreads, there will, doubtless, be an enormous number of diggers from all parts of the world. We shall suffer very most severely; indeed, already the prices of provisions have nearly doubled; everything finding its way back to New South Wales. The people here are already beginning to look after their copper, as likely in time to become the most valuable [illegible]arly through our winter, if winter it can be called, with a bright blue sky, and just cold enough to render fire agreeable, without its being necessary. We have now once at a distance, for a few hours."

NEW YEAR'S EVE.

BAKING THE NEW YEAR'S CAKE.

THE BAKING AND BREAKING OF THE NEW YEAR'S-EVE CAKE—A CHRISTMAS CUSTOM IN IRELAND.

(From a Correspondent.)

This fine old festival, whose origin is lost amidst the Pagan darkness that surrounds so many of the customs of this country, and yet rendered dear to its inhabitants by the joyous associations of childhood, like many others, is now passing away not only from the practice, but also from the recollection, of the people; yet they delight to talk of those times when the worthy good man, either in "the big house" or "comfortable homestead," made known to his cherished friends and humble dependents that the "lady of the house" or the "good woman" was to have her New Year's-eve Cake; and the sly invitation was sure to gather all who cherished genuine wit and humour to witness the making of the cake—that important portion of the meal—to enjoy the drollery of him or her installed as high priest, and to sing the requisite] incantations to secure the success of the charmed cake. This, having been once fairly placed on the griddle, (in those days our forefathers knew little of the oven for such uses), became an object of interest to more than one, and many were the sly colleens who, when the lad of her choice placed in the fire a sprig of the still verdant holly or ivy that decorated the kitchen, would adroitly steal in another little sprig to the blazing pile, to see if her fortune burned and kept pace with his; if it did so, (like the burnt nuts of All-shallows-eve) a smooth current of happiness for the coming year was indicated.

Those were, indeed, days of simplicity, when the baron and the peasant met alike under the same roof; when even the humble itinerant fiddler who played his way through the country was expected to witness the next aspirant to manhood lay hold of the well-made and substantial cake, and, with his mimic strength, dash it against the door, when it was shivered to pieces, whilst the assembled witnesses of the scene offered up in spirit an humble but fervent prayer that cold, want, or hunger might not enter that door for the ensuing year. The fragments of the cake were then scrambled for, and certain was he or she who succeeded in securing the first fragment that touched the ground, that they, too, would have a home and a New Year's Cake ere the next year was out.

To this succeeded a scene of romping, eating and drinking, dancing and singing, such as can only be witnessed in Ireland; and the mirth continues up to the hour that marks our passage from one year into another, when a fervent prayer is offered up to Him who has brought us thus to a new year, and enabled us to see the light of another.

We recollect, when a schoolboy, thinking with delight over our promised enjoyments of a New Year's Cake, and of all our schoolfellows having the same promise of enjoyment held out to them; whereas we believe that the practice is now only carried out in the more comfortable and wealthy homes of the south and midland counties of poor old Ireland.

BREAKING THE NEW YEAR'S CAKE.

THE RIGHT HON. THE EARL GRANVILLE, SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

GRANVILLE GEORGE LEVESON GOWER, second Earl Granville, eldest son, by the second daughter of the fifth Duke of Devonshire, of the first Earl, who was ambassador to Russia, the Hague, and for seventeen years at Paris, was born May 11, 1815. In 1823 he was sent to Eton; and in 1832 entered Christchurch, where he took his degree in 1836. In the following year he became under his father attaché to the embassy at Paris; and in 1836, being just of age, was returned to Parliament, without opposition, for the borough of Morpeth. In the same session he made his first speech, taking the Liberal side in a debate on the policy of the Quadruple Alliance.

At the general election, on the death of William IV., in 1837, his Lordship was again, without a contest, returned for Morpeth, and on the meeting of Parliament had the honour of moving the first address to her Majesty. At the close of the session he accepted the appointment of Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, retired from Parliament, and continued to hold the office until 1840; when, on the appointment of Sir George Anson to the governorship of Chelsea Hospital, his Lordship became a candidate for the vacated seat at Lichfield, and again had the good fortune to be elected without a contest. During his absence from the House, the question of repeal of the Corn Laws, first moved by Mr Villiers in 1838, had, through his perseverance, become prominent. Out of doors the agitation had gained ground, but in the House both the great parties were still opposed to any removal of the bread tax. His Lordship at once gave his support to the proposal for its total and immediate repeal; and, irrespective of party, both in office and opposition, in the Commons and the Lords, voted and spoke during the whole of the struggle for the untaxing of food, and the enfranchisement of commerce on the side of complete Free Trade. At the general election of 1841, he was again returned for Lichfield.

In the January of 1846 his Lordship was appointed Deputy-Lieutenant for Shropshire; succeeded to the peerage; and in the following session first spoke in the Lords, in support of the repeal of the Corn Laws. In July of the same year he was appointed Master of the Queen's Buckhounds, an appointment which at the close of the year he resigned to accept the office of an unpaid Commissioner of Railways; and in the May of 1848 he succeeded the Right Hon. Milner Gibson as Vice-President of the Board of Trade, and Mr. Macaulay as Paymaster of the Forces. In 1847 Mr. Ricardo's committee sat in the Commons on the Navigation Laws. In the following year Lord Granville was a member of the committee in the Lords, and subsequently, both on the second reading and in committee, spoke at length upon the question, especially in reply to Lord Brougham, pointing out that the state of our treaties rendered any measure of reciprocity such as Lord Ellenborough had proposed impossible; and that, as to America, the very preamble of their own law which declared it purely a retaliative act on the part of the United States, ensured us just so much liberty of navigation as we should grant—a view the correctness of which was early proved by the American proclamation, giving complete equality, except in the coasting, to our shipping with their own, immediately on the passing of the bill repealing our Navigation Laws. At the request of his Royal Highness Prince Albert, and assured by the most kindly-offered assistance of the late Sir Robert Peel, Lord Granville consented to act as Vice-President of the Royal Commission, for the Great Exhibition, of which he was throughout one of the most diligent working members. He spoke at the meetings at York and Birmingham; on board the Atlantic steam-ship, at Liverpool; and at Paris on the occasion of the visit in August last: and one of his best speeches in the House was in 1850, in reply to Lord Brougham's attack upon the Exhibition.

In the late session his Lordship was chairman of the committee on the Patent Laws, took the entire management of the proposed measure of reform; and, in introducing the bill, expressed himself not only in favour of such changes as were proposed, but as in his own conviction going so far as the belief that it would be best to have no Patent Laws. In October, 1851, Lord Granville was called to a seat in the Cabinet; and on Friday, December 27, had delivered to him the seals of the Foreign-office, as the successor of Lord Palmerston an office rendered the more difficult by the eminent ability and the home popularity of his predecessor.

Lord Granville, except on the questions we have named, has but seldom spoken in either House; but in the Lords he has been a working member of several important committees, and has been a constant supporter of Liberal measures.

His Lordship married, in 1840, the only daughter and heiress of the Duke of Dalberg, relict of Sir Ferdinand Richard Acton, Bart.

THE CLIPPER SHIP "CHRYSOLITE."

THE beautiful clipper ship Chrysolite, engraved below, is one of two fine vessels built at Aberdeen by Messrs. Hall and Sons, for the China trade; the Stornaway, of 600 tons, belonging to Messrs. Jardine and Matheson, merchants of London; and the Chrysolite, of 450 tons, belonging to the enterprising firm of Taylor and Potter, of Liverpool. The Stornaway arrived in the Thames some weeks back from her first voyage to China, after two splendid passages out and home, of 102 and 103 days, having beaten the American clipper ships Oriental and Surprise—in each case some days. The Chrysolite, of 450 tons, reached Liverpool on the 1st of December, after two surprisingly rapid voyages of 102 days out, and 104 home, having been absent but seven months and six days; and, like her consort, having completely beaten the American clipper Memnon, of 1200 tons. The latter ship sailed from Whampoa three days before the Chrysolite; notwithstanding which the latter came up with the Memnon on the 21st day, tried with her for fifteen hours in a dead beat to windward through the Gasper Straits, beat her completely, and left her 9½ miles astern, having had a good fresh breeze all the time. After this the Chrysolite fell in with H. M. frigate Havannah, of 20 guns, a very fine and fast-sailing vessel, of 1000 tons: the two were in company for fifteen days, and the frigate could not leave her; in fact, the Chrysolite kept her astern from two to five miles, as her log proves, although the frigate crowded every stitch of canvas she could set, thus proving her admirable sailing qualities; while the officers of the Havannah acknowledged that she was the only ship they had ever fallen in with during their commission that had been able to hold with them. The two vessels parted company about 700 miles from the Azores—the frigate for Portsmouth, the Chrysolite for Liverpool; the latter arriving three days before the frigate. Her official character, as given by her captain, proves her a most superior ship: and her whole performance shows that, whenever it comes to a fair field and real work, she is well able to cope with and lead the fastest of the "boasted American clippers." The Flying Cloud has, it appears by the American papers, gone on from California to China, to take the place of the Memnon, unfortunately lost in the China sea, after being left by the Chrysolite. The Flying Cloud will thus make the return voyage in company with the Stornaway and Chrysolite, and their respective powers will be well tried.

It is a remarkable fact, that the Chrysolite within the past year was launched and fitted; sailed on her first voyage last April; returned, and will sail on her second voyage to China next week; all within twelve months; the builder, owners, and captain having just reason to be proud of each other and their ship.

The Chrysolite made the voyage from Liverpool to Anjeer in 80 days. This is the quickest voyage on record. The Oriental made the same passage out in 89 days, and that was without precedent; but, for the present, the Chrysolite has the palm. This ship, we understand, was built expressly to contest the voyage with the Oriental. She is 440 new and 570 old tons burthen, but carries nearly 800 tons of tea; and this is the desideratum which this new build has realised, and which promises soon to be generally adopted. It is now eleven years since the Aberdeen bow was invented by the Messrs. Hall of that city; when they suggested a deviation from the ordinary form, and showed also, that, by the new law of tonnage measurement, the properties of fast-sailing and large-tonnage burthen might be combined. They proposed to run the stem out so as to form the cutwater, and to make the floor and run in proportion to the sharpness of the bow. The vessel built on this model was masted and rigged pretty much after the channel fashion, and surprised everybody by the quickness of the voyages which she made between Aberdeen and London. Three other vessels were built on the same plan; and thenceforward the Aberdeen bow was a triumph in naval architecture. Since then Messrs. Hall have built fifty vessels, measuring about 30,000 tons per register: they were for owners in London, Liverpool, Leith, China, and India; and it is a remarkable fact that only one of these ships has been wrecked or cast ashore, or even seriously damaged, although they have been all constantly at sea since they were built.

The following are the dimensions of the Chrysolite:—

MUSIC.

GRAND PERFORMANCE OF MENDELSSOHN'S "ŒDIPUS," AT WINDSOR CASTLE ON NEW YEAR'S DAY.

On Thursday evening, according to the custom since her Majesty's accession to the throne, to celebrate the New Year by a musical entertainment, Mendelssohn's "Œdipus" was performed. It is to the classical taste of his Royal Highness Prince Albert that amateurs are indebted for the introduction in this country of Mendelssohn's fine work, the music to the "Œdipus at Colonos" of Sophocles. The first time this noble production was heard here, was on the anniversary of the marriage of our most gracious Queen, the 10th of February, 1848, at which period an abridged English version, by Mr. Bartholomew, was executed under the direction of Mr. Anderson, with a complete band and chorus; Mr. Bartley, and the author of the adaptation, as chorus speakers, recitingthe poem. In the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS of Feb. 19, 1848, there is an illustration of the rehearsal of this performance, which took place in the Picture Gallery at Buckingham Palace. On the 10th of June, 1850, the "Œdipus" was performed at the Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden, at the annual morning concert of Mrs. Anderson, pianiste to the Queen, and musical instructress to the Princess Royal, under Costa's direction; but, owing to the want of sufficient rehearsals, the choral singing was very unsatisfactory.

At Thursday's performance, before the Royal amateurs, Mr. Bartley read the poem, assisted by Mr. Bartholomew. The chorus has been selected from the Sacred Harmonic Society, and from the professional Chorus-singers of the two Italian Opera-houses, by Mr. Grice. Mr. Anderson conducted the work. A platform was erected in the Waterloo Gallery, on which were seated the two choirs, amounting to about fifty voices. In the centre Mr. Bartley was placed; before him was Mr. Anderson with the quartet party, Messrs. Benson, Grice, Beale, and Smithson, and the orchestra in front, the wind instruments being located beneath the cancellate, right and left. The furniture of the Tipped Saloon formed in the late Exhibition formed a line of demarcation between the stage and the seats of her Majesty and Prince Albert and the persons who had the honour of receiving invitations.

Her Majesty's private band consists of Mr. Anderson (director), Sainton (violin solo), Nickel, E. Chipp, Cusins, Day, Buels, Betts, Egerton, jun., Guinness, Hill (viola), H. Chipp (violoncello), Schroeder, jun. (ditto), L. Schroeder (contrabasso), Malsch and Horton (oboe), Williams (clarionet), Mountney (fagotto), Waitzig and W. Card (bassoons), Richardson (flute), P. and G. Hardy (horns), C. Schroeder and Beddington (trumpets), Germann (trombone), and W. Hardy (drums). This efficient chamber band was strengthened, on this occasion with the addition of Piatti, Blagrove, Lucas, Baeth, Watson, Simmonds, Withers, J. Loder, Streathe, Webb, Trust, Hancock, Pratten, and Campanile, making altogether an excellent orchestra of players.

The performance commenced at eight o'clock, the rehearsal having taken place at Buckingham Palace on the preceding day.

Mendelssohn's music to "Œdipus Colonens" is the last of the series of works produced at Berlin during the gifted composer's engagement with the King of Prussia. His first composition of this class was the "Antigone," in 1841, completed within the almost inconceivable space of eleven days. In 1843 he wrote the fairy music to the "Midsummer Night's Dream;" in 1844 the music to Racine's tragedy of "Athalie," which will be performed shortly by the Sacred Harmonic Society; and in 1845 he produced his music for "Œdipus at Colonus," connected with which is the tradition that Sophocles read this tragedy to his judges when accused by his unnatural children of being unable to manage his affairs, and that the judges conducted the poet in triump to his house, such was the effect of the poem.

However ill-calculated the music of the "Œdipus" may be considered for a miscellaneous audience, arising perhaps from the sombre subject and from the mixture of speaking with singing, in no competition of the illustrious composer has his genius been more positively exhibited. The "Œdipus" startles the ear by its marked originality—nothing like it in form and idea can be traced in any pre-existing composition of the classic school; its adaptation to the colossal locale is perfectly astounding. The hearer seems to be removed to ages long gone by, and yet in its severity there is no pedantry. The accompaniments to the spoken dialogue penetrated to the very heart's core, so true and touching is the contemplation of the master mind. If imagination can supply the loss of the Greek tone, then may the inspirations of Mendelssohn in "Œdipus" be supposed to assume the aspect of historic accuracy. The appeal of Antigone to the blind seer, in his half other blind and aged sire, with its orchestral undercurrent, is a most exquisite passage. How noble is the chorus, "Thou comest to the land," and how exciting the incentive to the battle for the rescue of the daughters of Œdipus. The thunder chorus is grand and impressive, almost beyond precedent. The lament of Antigone at her father's disappearance is another gem, in which orchestral painting attains the sublime over art. There is a stately upheaval throughout the "Œdipus" which would render it, with stage accessories, a most attractive work to all auditors who have a keen sense of the pure and beautiful in the highest dominion of art's regions; and even the sympathies of general audiences could not be refused in the fine thoughtful, pathetic phrases, and classical conceptions to be found in the music of Mendelssohn's "Œdipus."

MR. BUNN'S OPERATIC ARRANGEMENTS.

Meyerbeer's "Robert le Diable" is in active preparation at Drury-Lane Theatre. There will be a costly ballet de cour, and the orchestral and choral force will be on the most effective scale. Mdme. Evelina Garcia will make her first appearance on the London boards in the character of Alice. Miss Crichton, formerly of the Royal Academy of Music, and of the pupil of Manuel Garcia, will sustain the part of the Princess. The new tenor M. Fedor, a Russian by birth, who has sung in France and Italy with success, will appear in Robert, and Mr. Drayton will also make his début in the same character. Four new singers from the provinces. Mrs. Sims Reeves will make his first appearance in Auber's production. The first new opera will be by Balfe, the libretto by Mr. Bunn; and the other novelty will be Maclfern's new opera, with the libretto by Mr. John Oxenford. On Wednesday night Miss P. Horton sang the music of Hecate, in "Macbeth," the chorusses in which were excellently sung; and Miss Poole, Miss Lindsay, Miss R Isaacs, Mr. G. Manvers, Mr. Denham, and Mr. Drayton, were the principal singing witches. In noticing the active lessee's musical arrangements, some mention of Mr. Isaacson's clever adaptation of the music of the new pantomime is due, the instrumentation displaying much ear and the selection of tunes being appropriate and piquant. In these days of executive legerdemain, the satire of the Clown (Mr. Marshall) is more than diverting—it is positively instructive; and the peals of laughter with which this remarkably clever cancellative is received, indicate that the public is alive to the absurdity of mere tours de force. Mr. Marshall's style of playing the passages of Sivori and Bottesini in the "Carnaval di Venize" variations is of no ordinary excellence; nothing can be more droll than the one executed with the bow attached to the foot, and with the fiddle transversely in the hands; the fainting away in the arms of Pantaloon at the end of a sentimental cadenza is equally comic.

HERR SOMMER'S CONCERT.

The performances of Herr Sommer on the Sommerophone at the Great Exhibition have rendered his name familiar to the public; but it is not so much his execution and that of his colleague Herr Horyanye, clever as it is, on the barytone and soprano Sommsorophone, which render the concerts at Willis's Rooms so curious, as the playing of the Hungarian Gipsies, which is a study in national music. There are seven stringed instruments, including a left-handed violoncello player, and a huge double-bass, two clarionets, one ophicleide, and four cornists. The players, with their scarlet tunics and gold braid, yellow boots and ankle boots, rich yellow fringe, and black caps and feathers, look quite picturesque; and their statuesque style of standing, playing from memory, with their more animated leader, Herr Lavotta, who looks like Tamour the Tartar, would not lead the listener to suppose that there was so much soul in their execution. It is, of course, of the Straus clock-like school, with the strongest possible accent and most emphatic rhythm. The Hungarian executants are most fear-stirring and head-moving. M. Dupont, a pianist, who played one of Liszt's most fantastic pieces—a fantasia on the "Prophète" themes—seems worthy of a better position than that of playing in a promenade concert.

MUSICAL EVENTS.

Mr. George Genge, the tenor, gave an evening concert on Tuesday, at the London Tavern, assisted by the Misses Jolly, the Misses Wells, Mrs. Temple, Miss Poole, Miss Felton, Miss Ransford, Messrs. Kenny, Stretton, F. Smith, Holmes, Ransford, G. Farren, and Lefft.

Under the direction of Mr. M. Davies, an evening concert took place on Monday at the Beaumont Institution, Mile-end. The chief singers were Miss Dolby, Miss Eyles, Miss Gibbs, Mr. Misses Alexander, Messrs. Swift, Longmans, and Wollgrove, with Herr Van Heddeghem, on the violoncello.

Mendelssohn's "Elijah" was performed on Tuesday night by Mr. C. Salaman's Amateur Choral Society.

Mr. John Parry delivered his "Notes" at the Horns Tavern, Kennington, on Tuesday night.

Mr. G. Buckland, on Thursday night, gave a lecture on old English and patriotic Music, at the Islington Literary and Scientific Institution

The London Thursday Concerts will be resumed on the 8th inst.

The anniversary of the Madrigal Society will be commemorated on the 15th inst., and Mr. Ella will commence his Musica. Winter Evenings on the 22d inst.

The great Birmingham Triennial Musical Festival will take place on the 7th, 8th, 9th, and 10th of September, under the direction of M. Costa. The Norwich Festiva., under Benedict's direction, postponed on account of the Exhibition, will also take place in the autumn. The meeting of the Three Choirs will be this year at Hereford, under the conductorship of Mr. Townshend Mudge.

Madame Oury will give a matinée musicale at Brighton, next Monday.

Mr. E. Laurent's prize of ten guineas for the best original quadrille will be awarded next Monday, at the Argyll Rooms.

FOREIGN MUSICAL NEWS.—Mdme. Sontag made her début at Cologne on the 18th inst., as Maria in Donizetti's "Figlia," with immense success. Alboni made her début at Turin in "Cenerentola," and was received with enthusiasm. A new opera by Herr Unger, "Tiberius Gracchus," is in rehearsal at Weimar. Beethoven's natal day (Dec. 15) has been celebrated in various towns in Germany with great honours. Tne dramatic young Swedish singer, Jenny Lind, at Berlin, Mdlle. Ebeling, the day after she was to have made her début in "La Figlia," had created a painful sensation.

THE THEATRES.

DRURY LANE.

On Wednesday Miss Glyn appeared as Lady Macbeth. The house was crowded. The tragedy was efficiently placed upon the stage, Mr. Anderson enacting the guilty Thane. This gent eman made a better Macbeth than we had expected. He has many of the physical qualifications needed for the character; but the monotony of his elocution prevents us from understanding what he precisely means. Very different is it with Miss Glyn, who gives a severe intellectual outline to a definite conception. The cold, calculating, materialistic woman stands out in bold relief—the sceptical scorner even of the "murdering ministers" to whom she appeals:—

Whatever in your sightless substances
You wish on Nature's mischief.

Thus implying more than a doubt of their visibility and inhabitancy. treating them, indeed, as the fictions of a superstitious fancy—such as that by which her scrupulous lord was hagridden. In her calm, staid, matured conception of Miss Glyn's rôle, we hear the articulations of this terrible mental state, freed from the influence of all moral feeling But in every human heart there lie unexplored depths. This Lady Macbeth finds, at least, in her own case. The period of reaction comes, and new awakened thoughts go sounding down the profound abysm of the unsuspected spirituality within, and make companions of "sorriest fancies." In her eyes, so does Macbeth even at this very moment when she is plotting Banquo's murder—when the only "scorpions" of which his mind is "full" are not the pangs of remorse, but the twin facts that "Banquo and his Fleance live." For one moment only the murderess's instinct arrives in her—"But to them" For one moment only the murderess's instinct arrives in her—"But to them" nature's copy's not eterne." Then she sinks again into that depression which conducts to somnolency and suicide. Meanwhile, Macbeth, having resumed his self-possession, resumes also his authority as a husband, conquers his pleas with more than her, and exercises it without her connivance or required consent. Such is the outline of Lady Macbeth's character as conceived by Miss Glyn, and she works out the idea with an inflexibility of purpose which, in its consistency, becomes masculine. Yet this fine idea, and the sublime real isation of it, were fully recognised and appreciated by the numerous audience, who, on her appearance before the curtain, cheered the actress with an unanimity of applause that demonstrated that all agreed in the same approving judgment.

THE CHRISTMAS PANTOMIMES, AND OTHER ENTERTAINMENTS.

The pantomime at DRURY-LANE proves to be a carefully compiled and well-appointed stage production. The subject, eminently moral as it is, and hallowed by association with the name of Hogarth, must commend it to favourable attention from all who consider the legitimate aim of entertainment is of unexceptionable quality. The two Paynes, in Toby Cricket and David Drone, show an inexhaustible activity. The scenery is occasionally costly—such as the Interior of the Beehive, and the grand Palace at the conclusion. Some of the incidental allusions are amusing, though few are political Two relate, indeed, to Paris "gay," and "in a state of siege"—with "plenty of balls" in the former case, and "plenty of bullets in the latter." Mr. H. Marshall's droll imitation (in imitation of Ernst and Sivori, were clever and mirth-provoking. The Bloomer costume of course comes in for its share of ridicule. On the whole the pantomime is of a very satisfactory order, and has a stateliness and decorum which is suitable to the classic locale on which it is produced. The performance on Friday commenced with the tragedy of "Fasio," for the purpose of introducing Miss Glyn. She met with a most brilliant reception. The appearance of the audience, also, was crowded and fervent, that she was urged beyond her usual degree of force in the performance of the character. Her broad classical style is eminently suited for the stage, and her voice is powerful enough for the house. The plaudits bestowed evidently had the effect of stimulating the actress to fresh exertions, and, in consequence, she made many impulsive points which told well. When summoned before the curtain, it was evident that Miss Glyn's nerves, and her physical energies; but her apparent indisposition was only temporary. On Saturday Miss Fitzpatrick made a successful début as Letitia Hardy, in "The Belle's Stratagem." The comedy was followed by the Bateman Children in "The Young Couple."

The pantomime next in importance to that of DRURY LANE is the HAYMARKET. Mr. Flexmore is triumphant as Clown; but he has not been quite careful enough in the Haymarket version of the comic business. Several of the allusions are, of course, good. He, too, has indulged in imitations, not of musicians, however, but of eminent ballet-dancers, and in particular of Mr. T. P. Cooke's harlequin. The scenery is throughout beautiful. The piece was preceded by "The Merchant of Venice," in which Mr. C. Kean, of course, enacted Shylock. A more serious rôle, however, was undertaken by him on Tuesday, and one comparatively novel, the part of Sir Edward Mortimer, in Colman's "Iron Chest." Whether Mr. Kean may be said to inherit the genius for this part. It suits him nearly or quite as well as it did his father; that is, he performed it with a natural aptitude which left nothing to be desired either in the conception or execution.

At the ADELPHI THEATRE, the pantomime of "Red Rufus" presented the public with a new clown, Mr. Edwin Edwards, who with the piece achieved complete success. The manner in which the harlequinade has been treated on the stage is unique. The comic scenes contain abundant allusions to passing events and the follies of the hour, having in this an advantage, we think, over its contemporaries. The success of the entire pantomime was decided. Never, indeed, was "proceeds its performance, but was too lastily got through to justify criticism.

We have little to add to what we have already recorded of the pantomime at SADLER'S WELLS. Mr. Robert Brough has newly crowded, and the production, as it deserves, has triumphantly successful. "The Lady of Lyons" preceded, in which Miss Cooper, who has returned to the house, re-appeared, and was warmly received. The engagement of Miss Cooper's lady has rendered it possible to revive "Ingomar," and on Monday she sustained the character of Parthenia.

The Punch-Pantomime at ASTLEY'S has also been highly successful, though the allusions in it to passing events are but few; but there is an abundance of neat rows and rough mishaps well calculated to ensure the popularity of the piece.

At the SURREY, the scientific pantomime by Mr. Blanchard has met with a deserved success, not only for the excellence of its accessories, which are indeed unexceptionably rich, but for its theatrical aim.

The pantomime at the MARYLEBONE claims to be a treble X, and its author a "licensed wit," alias Francisco Frost. The name of his composition is "Sir John Mercury, or the Enchanted Champagne and the Fairies of the Hop and Vine"—a popular subject with John Bull at all times. The pantomimic characters are as follows:—Miss Adelaide Malcolm, Columbine; Paul Kellar, Pantaloon; Mr. Marshall, Clown; and M. Perry, Harlequin. The scenery, by Mr. Middenhall, is striking, animated, and original. A union of the political with the grotesque was evidently aimed at, and to a great extent successfully.

In the class of burlesques, the LYCEUM, with Mr. Planché for its provider, takes the highest rank. He has done ample justice to "La Reine au Bois" of his favourite Contesses, and well do the company and management support the efforts of the author. The scenes at the Fairies' Desideratum looked pretty and interesting, and sang remarkably well. The "Chamber of Point Lace," in which she is confined is magnificent. It is brilliantly illuminated with wax candles. They were glad to see Madme. Vestris, as the Fairy Queen, wielding the princess, and wearer of an amulet to preserve her mistress from evil. Miss St. George, also, as Fêlix, Prince of Happy Land, was welcomed. Nothing could be better than Mr. T. Matthews' make-up for the Duke of Vert Vert Verdure. The burlesque throughout is extravaganza is unusually sparkling; and the scenery by Messrs. Beverley and Meadows exceeded even the high expectation which we had formed of it.

We have already given a full account of the Brothers Brough's extravaganza at the HAYMARKET. Full justice has been done to the scenery, costumes, and cast. Mr. Bland and Mr. Buckstone are seen to their characteristic manner in the parts of Hercules and Iolaus. The ensemble is highly satisfactory. The literary merits of the piece, as we have already intimated, reach a standard of excellence rarely attempted in this class of productions, and ought to ensure it a marked success.

Mr. Paul Bedford, as the Robber Baron and Wolf, in the ADELPHI Christmas piece of "Little Red Riding Hood," maintains his character as an eccentric actor; and with Miss Woolgar as Little von Bazen, Miss Kathleen Fitzwilliam as Red Riding Hood, and Miss Emma Harding as Krankheit, the Rr witch, made the success of the piece certain. Nor was Mr. G. Honey, as Grimbold, less deserving of admiration; he was indeed capital

At PUNCH'S THEATRE, "The Twelve Labours of Hercules" proves to be an adaptation from a French drama, and its hero a French cavalier, who, at the instance of a Countess Hélène de l'Estrange, who wishes to rid herself of his suit, undertakes a series of to him herculean difficulties—all of which he has to get through in twelve hours. These are, not to drink, not to smoke, not to grumble, not to swear, not to kiss a pretty servant-girl, not to eat anything but dry bread, and to pay a large debt owing to usurers. The Countess enters into a conspiracy against him, but he succeeds in all. The cavalier was supported by Mr. Walter Lacy. With the piece embodying the pathetic story of the "Willow Plate," the audience of this little theatre were delighted, and it is likely to conduce considerably to the prosperity of the establishment.

SALLE ROBIN.—M. Robin has commenced the new year with a second season, and has added some novelties which merit public attention and patronage. Not only has M. Robin provided his usual marvels, but he has presented his patrons with some mechanical inventions and optical contrivances, which are as beautiful as they are wonderful. By means of the microscope he shows some surprising picturesque and monumental results, which, for their elegance and interest, have never been exceeded. The lecturer, in describing them, attributed the novelties and delicate manipulations alone to the inventive genius of M. Robin, who, in these exhibitions, rises much in our estimation as a scientific and mechanical originator in the department of optical mechanism and light.

SPOTS ON THE SUN.

(To the Editor of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.)

DIAGRAM OF THE SUN'S DISC, WITH THE OPAQUE SPOTS, AS SEEN ON THE 26TH OF DECEMBER.

ON Christmas-day the remarkable appearance of two exceedingly dark spots, connected by a vertical band equally opaque, was observed on the Sun's disc, as represented in the accompanying Diagram. The day throughout the day was extremely dense, with occasional intervals of less obscuration. During these intervals the Sun's orb became visible, when the spots were distinctly seen by the naked eye on its surface. The time during which my observations were made extended from 1 to 3 o'clock P.M.

My attention was first directed to the phenomenon by Mr. Exley, of Cotham, who had somewhat earlier in the day remarked the unusual appearance presented by the Sun.

THE QUEEN'S COLLEGES.—The Cork papers speak in terms of high admiration of the die which is intended to stamp the prize medals of the Queen's College. It is described as unique and classic in design, and as having been cut with surprising sharpness and elegance. It is in the style of the antique. The obverse bears the bust and profile of her most gracious Majesty, with the inscription, "College. Regin. Corcag. Fundat. A.D. MDCCCXLV.," with a circle of shamrocks. The reverse represents a winged female gracefully draped, with flowing hair, reclining on one knee, and seemingly intent on feeding the flame of a lamp, to which she is supplying oil from a vase which she holds in her extended right hand: motto, "Quæ ex cognitione pendet," bearing light in wisdom. The design was drawn by Mr. William Money, a pupil of the Cork School of Design. The die was sunk in Birmingham.

THE CONVICT DEPOT, QUEENSTOWN.—A disastrous fire occurred on Christmas-eve, at the convict depôt, Spike Island, near Cork. It originated in the flues of the washing-houses, and ere the military and other authorities on the island could suppress it, the flames extended to different points of the building, and committed great havoc. The loss will amount to several thousands. All the convicts were afterwards mustered, and none were found missing. The fire continued the whole night

The bench caused in the committee of the Catholic Defence Association, by the appointment of Mr. Wilberforce to the secretaryship, has been healed up for the present, and Mr. Wilberforce has entered upon the discharge of his duties.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

The steeple-chase calendar for next week does not contain a single appointment, and this morning fixtures are confined to Lytham, on Wednesday and Thursday; and to Greta-bridge, on Thursday. The racing fraternity are now taken up with the nominations, which, as far as they have transpired, promise well for sport next season.

SUNRISE FROM MONT BLANC.—As we reached the almost perpendicular wall of ice below the Rochers Rouges we came into the full moonlight; and, at the same time, far away on the horizon, the glow of daybreak. Gradually rising from the sky, and brightening higher and more distant mountains into relief. The union of these two effects of light was very strange. At first, the moonlight, and the entire world below warmed into the glow of sunrise.—Albert Smith's "Mont Blanc," in Blackwood's Magazine.

UNIFORM OR RAILWAY TIME.—It is proposed, by means of the electric telegraph, to regulate all the public clocks throughout the kingdom in accordance with Greenwich, or railway time. Precisely at noon the signal indicating Greenwich time, as observed by the great electric clock in the observation, Lothbury, is to be sent over the various lines of wire, giving at an approciable interval the exact time at every terminus. Greenwich time, as distinguished from local time, is at present kept by near y all the towns of importance in England, but they have not the advantage of exact regulation. The inconvenience of consequence where uniformity of time is not adopted, but where local time is adhered to, are Norwich, Yarmouth, Cambridge, Ipswich, Colchester, Harwich, Oxford, Bristol, Bath, Exeter, Portsmouth, Exeter, Dorchester, Launceston, and Falmouth, on the east and west of England.

THE ISTHMUS OF PANAMA.—Dr. Cullen, who has recently made a new survey of the Isthmus of Darien, has communicated some of the results of his observations, made on the Isthmus by Dr. Cullen, have brought to light the very important fact that a wide tract of entirely low and level land extends from Port Escoces, on the Atlantic coast of the Isthmus, to the river Sambo. This river, which falls into the Gulf of San Miguel on the Pacific, is navigable for 16 miles and upwards from its mouth for vessels of the greatest draught of water, and there would remain only to deepen eight miles of the upper course, and to cut nine miles more to the Atlantic, to carry over low and level land, in order to form a canal communication between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans. This projected canal route, from the excellence of the harbours on each side, its shortness, and the character of the country, presents favourable views which no route hitherto proposed can offer. The amount of work to be done is considerably less than that which yet remains to be done on the Panama Railroad.

THE FIRST PUBLIC APOTHECARIES' HALL.—With the fall of the Roman Empire, through the invasion of northern nations, arts and science left europe, and found a shelter among the Arabs, who preserved them for more propitious times; and, through their means never has equalled that of the Greeks and Romans, nevertheless chemistry and pharmacy are much indebted to them. They discovered several chemical preparations, and introduced several new medicines, still employed by all physicians. They established, in the eighth century, the first public apothecaries' hall in Bagdad. We owe also to the Arabs for the first legal dispensatories, in the ninth century, viz. for the one of Ebn Sahid; and in the twelfth century, for that of the Hakim Ebnalrah

EPITOME OF NEWS—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

The French Government have presented a chest of Sèvres china to Earl Granville (now Foreign Secretary), President of the Royal Commission, and a tea service to Mr. Dilke, member of the Executive Committee, as a testimonial of the sense on the part which they took in the Great Exhibition of the Works of all Nations in Hyde park, in the past year. The articles forming the presents alluded to have arrived in London.

The young men named Stratford, the illegitimate children of the late Earl of Aldborough, who were apprehended some months back at Leghorn, where they resided with their mother, on charges of treasonous conspiracy against the Tuscan Government and the unlawful possession of arms, have, within the last ten days, been found guilty by the Austrian court-martial who tried them, and sentenced as follows:—Henry Stratford, calling himself Lord Aldborough, and his brother, Charles Stratford, condemned to death; and Edward Stratford six years; and Charles Stratford has been set at liberty, the imprisonment previous to his trial being reckoned a sufficient punishment.

The Manchester status of Sir Robert Peel will be ready for casting in February or March. The great statesman is represented in the act of speaking. The cloak is rejected, but, instead of being wrapped round the body, it is thrown so much back as to exhibit the whole person, which is in the dress of the age. His right hand is extended, and grasps some papers; the left is lightly placed on the hip, in a position not unfrequently met with Sir Robert. The attitude is noble, the countenance a good likeness of the man, and the expression is at once graceful and dignified.

By an official return just made of the present position of the Roman Catholic Church in this country, it appears that in Great Britain there are 708 churches and chapels; 12 colleges for the education of ecclesiastical and lay students; 17 houses of religious men, including the Benedictines, Franciscans, Dominicans, Jesuits, Passionists, Oratorians, Redemptorists, Cisterians, Fathers of Charity, and Conceptionists; 62 convents for females of different orders. The number of clergy, including 1 archbishop and 12 bishops, is 1032. From the same return it appears that there are between 10 and 50 Roman Catholic bishops in the British colonies.

At Venice the birth-day of the Emperor of Russia has been celebrated officially, and with great pomp.

Marshal Radetzky had arrived at Milan.

Count Potocki, the Galician nobleman who was apprehended a few weeks ago at Hamburg as an Hungarian agent, was brought to Vienna on the 19th ult.

The Dutch Staats Courant announces that a convention has been concluded between the Netherlands and Austria for the transport of the Indian mail via Trieste.

The marriage of General Cavaignac and Mdlle. Louise Gabrielle Odier took place on the 24th ult., at the church of the Oratoire Saint Honoré. The service was performed by M. Coquerel. The ceremony, according to the Catholic rites, took place on the evening of the 26th, at St. Roch, the Abbé Lacazeill being the priest.

The most singular instance of the late Turner's reserve was, that he never would consent to have his likenes taken, except on one occasion, when in 1800, he sat as a young man for a series of small-sized portraits of members of the Royal Academy. He always had an impression that any knowledge of his burly form and uncouth farmer-looking appearance would affect the poetry of his works. He considered that it would throw a doubt upon their genuineness.

One of the prisoners confined in Devonport Gaol nearly effected an escape lately by boring a hole in the stone wall with a spoon!

A railroad will be commenced next spring from St. Petersburg, viâ Wilna and Blaystock, to Warsaw, nearly 750 English miles, to be completed in five years, and without recourse to a loan.

According to the Vienna newspapers, the Turkish marine is to be reduced, and Austria intends purchasing of the Porte two war-steamers. The Turkish war-steamer Taif, of 600-horse power, is to ply between Trebizond and Constantinople with merchandise, there being a want of tonnage there, though there are already seven private steamers on the track.

The Duke of Parma arrived at Innspruck on the 17th ult.; and the Grand Duke Constantine of Russia, who has been wandering about the Austrian dominions for some time past—without any one knowing precisely why—is now at Trieste.

A correspondent of "Kuhne's Europa" writes from Dresden that a number of humorous drawings, executed by the pencil of Schnorr, and accompanied by descriptions in his own hand, have been found in the possession of a Swabian family, with whom the great poet became acquainted during his residence at Loschwitz.

Another effort is to be made for the discovery of Sir John Franklin by means of a small screw-steamer, which is intended to penetrate into that part of the Polar seas which Sir John Franklin is supposed to have entered from Wellington Channel.

By a clause in the new City Sewers Act, now in force, the provisions with respect to houses in a ruinous and dangerous state are extended to any house or building which, in the opinion of the medical officer of health, is permanently unwholesome and unfit for human habitation.

The number of parcels passing "in" and "out" of the Euston-square terminus of the London and North-Western Railway during Christmas week amounted to nearly 40,000. Out of these 40,000 parcels, only two had the addresses lost. One of the trains brought up ten tons of poultry.

The Lords Commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury having directed that the navigation and shipping accounts of the United Kingdom be hereafter rendered in altered form, the collectors and comptrollers of the customs at the several ports of the United Kingdom have received directions, from and after the 5th inst., to omit the number of masts in the returns of shipping and tonnage annually transmitted to the registrar-general of shipping.

The South-Eastern Railway Company have just adopted a new merchandise traffic.

On Saturday morning a melancholy occurrence took place at Lord Ward's estate, known as the Trough Pits. A "banful" of men and boys was being lowered down one of the pits, when an elderly man, also engaged at the pit, probably not being aware of the immediate proximity of the pit's mouth, fell down the shaft, and in his fall the body striking with great violence the descending skip, two of them (a young man and a boy) were knocked out and precipitated to the bottom of the shaft. The bodies, on being brought out of the pit, were found to be sadly mutilated.

A rather amusing anecdote has been recounted in Paris this week apropos of M. Charles Hugo (son of Victor Hugo), who has been for some time imprisoned in the Conciergerie for "sedition writings." In the last number of Victor Hugo's late journal, A "volaur," fellow-prisoner of M. Charles Hugo, asked him how matiers were going on in the department of the Var, and if the votes were likely to give a large majority to the President. "Why do you want to know?" said M. Hugo. "Ma foi," replied the light-fingered gentleman, "parceque je m'en vais aux galères, et je voudrais que tout fut tranquuile là." (Because I'm going to the galleys, and I wish everything to be quiet there.)

There will be five Sundays in February next. A similar event will occur 28 years after; viz., 1880. Afterwards there will be no similar occurrence for 40 years, viz. 1920; because the year 1900 will not be leap-year, owing to the dropping a day on the completion of each century.

A man has just been arrested in Berlin for carrying on a strange sort of commerce. He bought children at about 10s. (9 florins) apiece, to take to London as street musicians, and was embarking with about 20 of them, when the police stopped them on him. His name is Hump.

On Wednesday night (according to ancient custom) the bells of the various churches in the metropolis rang forth merry peals to welcome the new year. They commenced at half-past seven o'clock, and did not cease until mid-night, after midnight. The street concerts by itinerant musicians were exceedingly numerous, and the performers reaped a good harvest from new year's gifts.

The number of works printed in all languages at Paris during 1851 was 7350; and during the last ten years, 64,356. In 1851 there were also printed 485 musical works, 1014 engravings and lithographs, and 133 maps and plans.

The value of grouse shootings has increased greatly in Atholl (Highlands) during the last ten years. The game on an estate now in the market, which let for many seasons at £100, and the highest £120, is now on a lease at £2100, independent of the grazing rent. This is equivalent to an enhancement of £3000 in the value of the property.

The Constitutionale of Florence mentions a most daring robbery which was committed there on the 20th ult. Some miscreants having effected an entrance into the cathedra., robbed an altar dedicated to the Virgin of all the gold, silver, and precious stones it contained. The most singular circumstance was, that they had the audacity to break down the precious metals on the spot, in order to carry them off more easily.

A Vienna letter of the 23rd ult. states that Kossuth's mother is believed to be dead. The report of her arrest was only a few days old when it was followed by that of her decease. It has since been contradicted; but such is the state of the public mind, purposely kept in darkness, that the denial is received with suspicion. She was understood to have been brought a prisoner to Vienna, but the papers now say she died at Pesth. Whether she died on the way, or from long persecution after her liberation and return, or whether death overtook her in the hands of her tormentors, remains a mystery.

ST. EDMUND, and Others—In Enigma 701, place the two Black Pawns at Q Kt 3d and 4th, instead of Q B 3d and 4th.

A LOCAL SUBSCRIBER.—All parties entitled to receive a copy of the "Book of the Tournament" should send their names, forthwith, to the Secretary of the St. George's Club, Cavendish-square.

LADY.—You may perhaps obtain a copy of the little work called the "Text-Book for Chess-Players," of Leuchars, in Piccadilly. We know nothing of works on the other games mentioned.

BARRISTER.—The annual subscription to the St George's Chess Club is three guineas per annum. Apply to the secretary, Mr Longbottom.

ANOTHER MEMBER.—If we are correctly informed, the attention of the committee has again been directed to the subject of persons intruding themselves into the Club who are uninvited and "unconnected" with the institution, and we have no doubt that proper measures will be taken to secure the members from such intrusion in future? We have no space to discuss the inconvenience to which you allude.

ALBERT.—The games of the Chess Tournament, we believe, will shortly appear.

LANCASTER.—You should address Mr Löwenthal. We are unacquainted with his route, but we should think it probable he will visit Liverpool, Manchester, Edinburgh, Glasgow, and the chief intermediate places in the north and midlands.

IMPROVEMENTS IN EMIGRATION.—MRS. CHISHOLM.

A series of group meetings of persons proposing to emigrate in the Spring ship of the Family Colonisation Loan Society has been held during the last six weeks, at the society's office, 3, Charlton-crescent, Islington, and the information afforded on these occasions with respect to the advantages, in every point of view, which the system of colonisation founded and carried into existence by Mrs. Chisholm holds out to the "anxious classes" who seek a new home in the many South seems to account for the anomaly shown in the fact, that, whilst the Government Emigration Commissioners cannot fill one single ship with emigrants, although they offer them a free passage, Mrs. Chisholm is literal y overwhelmed with applications for berths on board her ships, notwithstanding that the society advances but a small portion—about a fourth—of the passage-money, and that as a loan, to the emigrant, to be repaid in instalments.

One of the main features of the society's system—the reunion of the family as who have scattered members both at home and in the colonies, while it presents a striking contrast to the crude attempts at isolated and individual emigration made by the Government Commissioners, commands at the same time the immediate and entire confidence of the struggling classes, to whose domestic and family ties and feelings it appeals with direct force.

There is another element, however, in the society's system, as explained at these group meetings, which, though apparently of minor importance, has had great influence in establishing its popularity; viz. the great improvements moral and physical, the advantages with respect to personal prosperity and decency, the preservation of health, bodily comfort, and superior treatment altogether, which are ensured to the emigrants during their long voyage; and which the accounts sent home by those who have emigrated by the society's former ships serve, are regarded, as in fact they are, as benefits of the highest importance. On board the Government ships the emigrants are huddled together with only a nominal separation of the sexes and of the married and the single, while the berths are dark and exposed to general view in the "tween-decks," so that regard to personal propriety is quite out of the question. The Family Colonisation Loan Society obviate these very objectionable features of the voyage by having the emigrants of different sexes and conditions of life placed in separate parts of the ship, and the berths enclosed by boards so as that each forms a small apartment; while at top and bottom of the "tween-decks" on each side of the ship running same pipes with perforated surface, which communicate with the upper deck, and thus maintain the most perfect ventilation night and day. By means of distillation, also, fresh water is obtained in large quantities daily, by a very simple process; and thus two of the main elements of healthy existence—good air and good water—are supplied in abundance. Another minor detail, while in itself an advantage of no mean importance, shows in a remarkable degree the truly humane and considerate spirit in which the benevolent lady who is the foundress of the society labours for the protect on of the poor. A glance at the evidence adduced before the parliamentary committee on the Passengers' Act will suffice to show the cruelties and insults, the fearful injuries to life and limb, which are inflicted by the drunken crew with perfect impunity on the emigrants during the license of that Saturnalia which prevails to a greater or less extent on board all ships when crossing the line. To prevent all abuses of this nature, which have been frequently followed by fatal consequence to life, the owners, commanders, and officers of the vessels chartered by the society, in their contract, are obliged to enter into an agreement, under large penalties, that such abuses (specified by name) shall be suffered to take place during the voyage, and the least infraction of the agreement entails on the owners the forfeiture of the large sum named in the contract.

Considerations of this kind it is, the neglect of which on board Government ships, and the enforcement of which on board the Colonsation Loan Society's vessels, cause a free passage in the one to be neglected for a paid passage in the other.

It is to be regretted that the public do not assist by their charitable donations as much as they ought, the truly excellent aims and objects of this benevolent society, which, with a moderate addition to its present funds, it is in a position to send out in the ensuing spring and summer at least 2000 emigrants of the most eligible description.

The group meetings are held on every Monday evening.

CONVICT DEMANDS FOR TRANSPORTATION TO AUSTRALIA.—MUTINY.

It would appear as though the news of the gold discoveries in Australia had penetrated to the wretched inmates of the hulks who have been sentenced to the penalty of transportation, and that they regard themselves as unfairly dealt with because they are not sent out at the public expense to the "land of promise," where, furnished with the convict's passport—a "ticket of leave," they may apply themselves to the pleasant task of literally "reaping a golden harvest," as some compensation for the sufferings they have hitherto endured at the hands of society, by whom they have evidently, in their own estimation been misunderstood. Indeed, these ill-treated gentry feel so indignant on this subject that they have had recourse to violence, in order to manifest their sense of the grievance, and asserting what a Parisian Professor of Barricades would call "the right of insurrection," they have risen en masse on board the Warrior at Woolwich, and, armed with knives and other weapons, have mastered together in one part of the ship in a body numbering upwards of 100, and demanded to be immediately conveyed to the diggings," refusing at the same time to perform their ordinary shore tasks, and withstanding for a considerable period the troops who were placed as an extra strong guard to overawe them. They have, however, been reduced to order, and measures have been taken to prevent any recurrence of the mutiny.

The whole affair speaks trumpet-tongued as to the light in which the criminal classes regard transportation to Australia, and the Government can have no preference to have published so evident a testimony as this and other recent occurrences exhibit, that their present system of transportation to the Australian colonies, by holding out reward instead of punishment, serves but to brutify the human heart, and utterly corrupt beyond redemption the stream of social life in those most important dependencies of the empire.

Deportation to the antipodes is, in fact, considered a magnificent boon by the criminal, who is quite as well aware as the honest man is, that, joined to its fine climate, New South Wales now presents the additional attraction of speedy wealth in its most concentrated form to the man with strength of arm to dig, or daring enough to rob the diggers.

The first indication of insubordination was given on Saturday afternoon last by the convicts who had been at work during the day in the Dockyard, at Woolwich, on their return to the Warrior convict-ship, where they sleep during the night. They rushed in gangs into one of the compartments set apart for a single gang, and refused to separate and go to their proper places until their grievances were redressed, the chief of which they declared to be their retention in the country, instead of being sent out to Australia. The whole of the convict guards were kept on board the ship during the night, in case of any outbreak, as threats were made use of on the part of the desperate and ruffianly characters of the dockyard, being made acquainted with the mutiny, he ordered the crew of the Fugard flag-ship to remain under arms during the whole night. The dockyard police of the R division were also ordered to be in constant readiness. On Monday, Captain Whitty and several of the authorities from London visited the Warrior, and examined several of the ringleaders, but the result of what took place has not been made public. In order, however, to prevent being taken by surprise, the whole of the convict-guard who did duty during the day in the dockyard were kept under arms all night. On Tuesday morning a detachment of the Royal Artillery arrived to do duty as a convict guard.

In the course of that day, between twelve and one o'clock, when the convicts returned from their work in the dockyard to take their dinner on board the Warrior as usual, their violence of conduct was excessive. They no sooner entered the ship than they rushed down and took possession of two of the decks, defying the guards or any of the military to come near them, at the same time staging, cursing, and swearing at any one who had got hold of pipes and tobacco commenced smoking. The guards were threatened in such a manner, that they represented to Mr. Masterman that it would be dangerous to go out with the convicts after dinner, as a statement of examples must be made on some one. Capt. the Hon. Montagu Stopford, acting superintendent, was immediately communicated with, and the aid of the guards of the Royal Artillery and Royal Marines having been called on board, the guards in charge of the convicts, with drawn cutlasses, went below and brought up and heavily ironed thirty-eight of the most outrageous, and disarmed them of the knives, forks, and sharpened files of which they had by some means become possessed. Twenty of the convicts were let the course of the afternoon, conveyed to London in the police-vans sent down to Woolwich for the purpose, and safely secured in the Milbank Penitentiary. The other eighteen were also heavily ironed, and taken on board the Wye in the river.

GERMAN POLICE.—One day, last week, Baron Manteuffel, whose interest in the police system of Prussia naturally increases with its growing importance in the system of government, paid an unexpected visit to the bureau of M. Hinckeldy, the president of the Berlin police, to inspect the buildings, offices, records, &c., of the establishment. In one of the offices he observed a large book, in which, he was informed, are entered the names, residences, &c., of the inhabitants of Berlin, with personal and biographical notes and illustrations. The Premier, on inquiring whether these records enabled the police to give instant information concerning any person who might be suspected, and entire official career until his nomination to the premiership. M. Manteuffel then named his brother and other persons, and received concerning them information equally minute. In the course of his inquiries he learned that there were 20,000 inhabitants of the city bearing the surname of Schmidt, and nearly the same number of Müllers. 34,000 of the residents had been convicted of greater or lesser offences. On leaving the bureau he visited the police telegraph station, and witnessed several experiments. Berlin is divided into six telegraphic districts, each having its station in communication with the central bureau of the president of police, so that an order may be conveyed to all the bureaux at the same moment.

TESTIMONIAL TO THE MAYOR OF SOUTHAMPTON.

THE inhabitants of Southampton have just testified their sense of the public spirit of their thrice-elected Mayor, Richard Andrews, Esq., by the presentation of a magnificent service of plate The ceremony took place in the Victoria Room, on the evening of Dec. 18, in the presence of upwards of a thousand persons. The chair was filled by George Laishley, Esq.

Amongst the gentlemen present were nearly the whole of the aldermen and members of the town council, the principal tradesmen of the town, &c.

On a table in front of the orchestra was placed the splendid service of plate, consisting of a magnificent 28-inch salver, complete tea and coffee service, claret jug, four dishes and covers, kettle and stand, two cake baskets, and two 12 inch salvers and pint mugs. The Mayor's crest is engraved on each separate article; and in the centre of the large salver is beautifully written the following inscription, prepared, at the request of the committee, by John Ballar, Esq.:—

Presented by Voluntary Subscriptions,
On the 18th of December, 1851,
Together with a Service of Plate, value 400 Guineas,
To RICHARD ANDREWS, Esq.,
As a memorial of his public spirit, energetic assiduity, and munificent hospitality, in discharging the duties of the Mayoralty of Southampton; to which, after two successive years of service, he has been a third time called.

May our Municipal Institutions ever be upheld
By industrious hands, sound minds, large hearts,
Above faction, corruption, and selfish ambition;
Loyal to the throne of our constitutional monarchy,
Respectful to its laws,
Earnest conservators of a generous and enlightened
Freedom,
Founded on reverence towards God and goodwill to every man.

SERVICE OF PLATE PRESENTED TO THE MAYOR OF SOUTHAMPTON.

The plate was supplied by Mr. H. Abraham, silversmith, of the High-street, from the manufactory of Messrs. Smith, Nicholson, and Co., 12, Duke-street, Lincoln's Inn-fields. The selection of the pieces had been carefully made by the committee, and a more beautiful or appropriate presentation it would be difficult to conceive. The whole of the plate has received the most unqualified approbation of the subscribers; especially the tea service, which is of a very novel and elegant design.

The Chairman, in presenting the superb gift, reviewed Mr. Andrews' public services, and his untiring energies in the interests of the port and the prosperity of the town. "And," said Mr. Laishley, "last, though not least, allow me for a moment to refer to the manly, the noble, and truly British reception given by you, sir, to the illustrious Hungarian patriot, Louis Kossuth (Loud and long-continued cheering) an act of large-hearted generosity, which has been appreciated not only by the inhabitants of Southampton, but by the majority of the British nation; preceded, too, as that act was, by so many previous acts of kindness and attention to his expatriated fellow-countrymen, and which led that noble and distinguished man to declare, that before his arrival he felt bound by lasting gratitude to Southampton for numerous tokens of high-minded sympathy with the cause of his dear native land." (Tremendous cheering.) In conclusion, the chairman read the inscription engraved on the salver, and on resuming his seat the whole company gave several hearty rounds of cheering.

The band then performed "The Old English Gentleman;" at the close of which —

The Mayor rose amid renewed shouts of applause, which having at length subsided, he thanked the 1500 subscribers to the Testimonial his friends, neighbours, fellow-townsmen, brother Foresters and Odd Fellows—for this splendid testimonial of their approbation, and concluded an eloquent address amidst the enthusiastic cheers of the company.

Mr. Douglas and Mr. Wilkin, secretaries to the subscription; Mr. Crosbey, the American Consul in Southampton; and other gentlemen; addressed the meeting.

Three hearty cheers were then given for the chairman; several rounds of cheering for the Queen, for America, for Louis Kossuth, for the Mayor, &c.; and the assemblage having gradually thinned, the room was cleared for dancing, which was kept up with much spirit till midnight, Mr. Douglas ably officiating as M.C.

FASHIONS FOR THE NEW YEAR.

THE cold weather of the last few days of the closing year has had the effect of bringing out the true winter toilettes in full force. Sable is still worn, and vison for fur; all others are almost quite abandoned. The Chambord cloaks are made of cloth, generally black, edged with velvet or silk braid about 1½ inch wide, or watered silk ribbon of the same shade as the cloaks. In the beginning of the season these cloaks were made with hoods; but soon, as we had foreseen, public taste gave up this heavy and ungraceful appendage and fashion, to have the last word in this important matter, converted the real hood into a fictitious one, which is composed of two side cuttings coming over each other at the top of the cloak, and which ornaments the back without overloading the shoulders. Dresses of the same stuff are very much in vogue, particularly for the morning; the skirts are made quite plain; the body alone is trimmed with braid, a fashion which seems likely to last out the winter for walking toilettes. Many dresses are trimmed with plain velvet bands. These bands or stripes are six or eight in number, more or less according to their width: they diminish as they approach the body, and never rise higher than the two-thirds of the dress. Woollen popeline, which we mentioned some time since, continues in favour, which it has attained by its suppleness and elegance. It is generally worn plain or plaid. Evening and dinner dresses are worn with three flounces, a fashion invariable for this year. Net is likewise most recherché for ball dresses: all shades are worn, trimmed with flounces, ornamented with satin ribbons to match, or gold or silver thread. We take the opportunity of admonishing ladies to use sparingly these gold or silver ornaments. They are not generally worn, and are not considered of the best taste.

THE ILLUSTRATIONS.

Velvet capote, with the crown soft; the top has three slides, rather large, and the fourth forms the edge. It is without trimming inside the front; the flowers are generally poppies of various shades. Black velvet cloak, trimmed with sable, with muff of the same. These cloaks are rather short, not fitting much to the waist; and the sleeves are short, so as to allow for the muff. Dress of Chambord cloth, with plain skirt.

Violet terry-velvet bonnet; a bunch of feathers on one side, and a smaller one on the other

Plain cloth cloak, Chambord shape, made to be taken up on each side, like sleeves; trimmed with velvet of different widths, or a wide braid, trimmed with a velvet band.

Small plain black velvet paletot, with cuffs to the sleeves. This little paletot may be trimmed with either lace or braid, and jet.

Waistcoat of white quilting, with pockets, and double stitched all round. Small neckcloth, a silk ribbon. Collar of English point lace. The skirt may be made of coloured silk or taffetas, generally of the same shade as the paletot.

Habit-shirt, or jabu, closed in front, and fastened by small coral or diamond buttons, with turndown collar. The neck open in front is of Nancy lace, and fastened in front with a shirt-pin.

White double-breasted waistcoat; high chemisette of lace, and collar of English embroidery. Cap of silk stuff, forming a calotte, trimmed with lace of Alençon point At the top of the first trimming is fastened a slight silk fringe under several bunches of silk or velvet ribbon. For indoors, and for dress parties, the lace lappets are replaced by ribbon like the bunches

Little ribbon ornament is placed round the gloves, fastened by a gold chain; the ribbon is also confined to the wrist by a small elastic cord.

THE launch of this fine steamer, on December 23, from the building-yard of Messrs. C. J. Mare and Co., at Blackwall, was noticed in our Journal of last week. We now engrave the ceremony, and subjoin the correct details of the vessel.

The Faid Gihaad iron steam-yacht is of the extraordinary size of 2200 tons, built for his Highness the Pachs of Egypt. It was commenced in the beginning of the present year. She is to be fitted at present in a very elegant style as a yacht, and is pierced for gun-ports and every other requisite to make her a most efficient war steamer. The following are her principal dimensions; viz.:—

A second large iron screw steam-ship, the Lady Jocelyn, was also launched by the above firm for the General Screw Steam Shipping Company; and on the same day the Challenger clipper was launched from the building-yard of Messrs. Green.

Messrs. Mare and Co. are building at Orchard Wharf, at the present moment, about £500,000 worth of steam-ships of all classes and for all countries, including those of England, Spain, Austria, Egypt, and Rome.

SHIP ON FIRE AT HONG-KONG.

ON the 20th of October a fire broke out on board the Fort William, the receiving-ship of the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company, from the upsetting of a pot of an inflammable polishing mixture. As the wind was blowing fresh at the time, the bamboo awning was speedily consumed, and the flames spread with such rapidity to the poop, that the family of Captain Macqueen had barely time to escape to the entering port on the gun-deck, whence they were rescued by the boats of her Majesty's ship Hastings. By the united exertions of the officers and men of her Majesty's ships Hastings, Sphynx, Salamander, and Meander, United States sloop of war Marion, and Hon. East India Company's steamer Nemesis, the Peninsular and Oriental steamers Singapore and Sir C. Forbes, and the H. and C. Hong-Kong (in readiness to tow in case of need), the fire was extinguished at a late hour, without having done much damage, except to the private effects of Captain Macqueen and his family, which, being all in the poop cabins, were totally destroyed. The other property on board the vessel was not of great value, consisting chiefly of a few chests of opium, and some Cambay stones, all secured; besides a few tons of coals, which the fire did not reach. The destruction of the poop, forecastle, bulwarks, and mast comprised nearly the entire injury done to the vessel, which, it is expected, will be completely repaired before the arrival of the next steamer.

NON-RESTRAINT IN LUNACY.

AMONG the numerous benefits which the superior skill and experience of the present age have bestowed upon suffering humanity, the application of the non-restraint system in our Lunatic Asylums has been attended with unvarying success. To its originator, Mr. Robert Gardiner Hill, surgeon, of Lincoln a late act of justice has been rendered by the presentation of a superb testimonial in recognition of his valuable services. The gift was purchased by subscription it consists of a very handsome silver centre-piece, with a circular plinth, ornamented with festoons; around the base are three elegant female figures, in frosted silver, supporting a basket for flowers. Upon one of the panels is an graved the following:—

"Presented, together with a Silver Tea Service, to Robert Gardiner Hill, Esq M.R.C.S. Eng., Author and Originator of the Total Abolition of Restraint in the treatment of the Insane, now commonly called the 'Non-restraint System,' by a number of Subscribers, medical and general, from all parts of the kingdom in token of their admiration of the talent which could devise, and the energy and patient perseverance which, despite of prejudice, opposition, and jealousy, could carry out a system fraught with results so eminently beneficial to mankind."

On the opposite side are inscribed the following extracts:—

"The Governors never expressed a wish for the extinction of restraints; they never expected it; not one of them deemed it possible."

"It was 'Mr. Hill who had the courage to broach the original and invaluable idea, that the use of instruments might be wholly dispensed with.' Sir E. Ff. Bromhead, Bart., Vice-President of the Lincoln Asylum."

"The real honour belonged to Mr. Hall, of the Lincoln Asylum."—Dr. Charlesworth.

In addition to the above piece of plate, the testimonial included a very handsome silver tea service; the presentation took place at a public dinner given to Mr. Hill, at the Great Northern Hotel, in Lincoln, on Oct. 29; Charles Ward, Esq., Mayor of Lincoln, in the chair

After the withdrawal of the cloth, and the customary loyal toasts had been drunk, the Mayor presented the testimonial to Mr. Hill, "whose claim," said the worshipful chairman, "to the authorship of non-restraint in the management of that unfortunate class of our fellow-beings afflicted with the direst malady that can befal humanity is now established." (Cheers). The Chairman then referred to the controversy upon this happy discovery; and, in testimony of Mr. Hill's claim as its originator, quoted the evidence of Sir E. F. Bromhead, who presided at a lecture delivered by Mr. Hill, when house-surgeon to the Lincoln Lunatic Asylum, and on which occasion he stated the non-restraint system to be his own. Added to this, are the testimony of Dr. Charlesworth, and the congratulations of Dr. Robinson, of Northampton, Dr. Munro, of Hull, and Mr. Dimond, of the Surrey County Lunatic Asylum, all of whom have subscribed for the testimonial.

Mr. Hill, in thanking the company for the elegant gift, took a review of the process by which he arrived at the important conclusion which he announced many years ago in his public lecture, "on the total abolition of instrumental restraint in the treatment of the insane;" viz. "that, in a properly constructed building, with a sufficient number of suitable attendants, restraint is never necessary, never justifiable, and always injurious, in all cases of lunacy whatever." Mr Hill then explained that his opponents use the term "non-restraint" to signify a mitigation of restraint; whereas he has ever employed it to signify the total abolition of all instrumental restraint, and of all severity towards the patients; a sufficient answer to the unjust accusation that Mr. Hill wished to "absorb all the credit" of amelioration as well as total abolition in his own person. "To a great merit of my discovery," says Mr. Hill, "consists in my having demonstrated that not only was it safe consistent with non-restraint, but that the only safe system was that of non-restraint; that, in truth, with regard to the patients, a maximum of restraint was safer than a medium, and a minimum of restraint than either." Mr. Hill then drew a harrowing retrospect of the sufferings of lunatics under the severe restraint system; and showed how the chaining of a poor lunatic to his bedstead, according to the "simple methods" recommended in the year 1835, proved fatal to the sufferer, and first determined Mr. Hill as to his future proceedings; since which, with one exception, no male patient in the Lincoln Asylum was ever after put under restraint. Finding that good effects invariably followed a milder treatment, Mr. Hill tabulated the results of different modes of restraint, considered in the several cases individually; lived amongst the patients; watched their habits; reflected that for some days together restraint had been dispensed with, although the principle had not been adopted as applied to the more violent cases, nor thought of; and at length Mr. Hill announced his confident belief, that, under a proper system of surveillance, with a suitable building, instrumental restraint was in every case unnecessary and injurious. This Mr. Hill adopted as a principle, and verified its theory by carrying it into effect. A hurricane of opposition to this system arose within and without the institution. Nevertheless, the system was carried on with safety. Not a single instance of suicide has occurred in the asylum since the adoption of this system, although such events were not unfrequent under the obstructive system. Even a maximum of restraint was safer than a medium, and nothing but constant surveillance by day and by night can prevent suicide over all systems alike. Sentiments, moreover, patients acquired habits of self-control, which is one great step towards cure; the proportion of recoveries increased; comfort and good order prevailed in the place of noise and uproar, and not one fatal accident occurred. Every subsequent year and every fresh trial has demonstrated the value and safety of this system. It has triumphed by its own intrinsic worth against prejudice, opposition, and calumny of every kind; and, although the violence of the opposition within the institution in which non-restraint originated at length compelled Mr. Hill to resign his situation, and although he was shut out from some other important posts because he was the author of that "absurd dogma" that "restraint is never necessary," yet he had lived to see that "absurd dogma" established as the principle of almost every large and well conducted asylum in the kingdom. (Applause.)

In the course of the evening the company was addressed by Mr. R. S. Harvey, on behalf of the committee; and the Rev. J. Daniel, Rector of East Eardsley, one of the secretaries, both of whom circumstantially established Mr. Hill's claims to the origin of the system.

We may here quote an interesting passage from a letter received by the Rev. Mr. Daniel from Dr. Forbes, in subscribing to the testimonial:—"I am glad to see that a testimonial (as testimony of whom a fund has been raised), says Dr. Forbes, "I have never overlooked those of Mr. Hill as the originator of the non-restraint system in our asylums. In proof of that, Dr. Conolly himself does justice to Mr. Hill's merits. Dr Conolly suggested to me, long ago, whether some portion of his subscription might not appropriately be devoted to the recognition of Mr. Hill's claims. This, of course, could not be done."

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.

SIR EDWARD DOLMAN SCOTT, BART.

THE death of this Baronet occurred on the 27th ult., at his seat, Great Barr Hall, in the county of Stafford. Sir Edward had completed his 83d year. He was the eldest son and heir of Joseph Scott, Esq., of Great Barr, High Sheriff of Staffordshire in 1779, and M.P. for Worcester from 1802 to 1805, who was created a Baronet 30th April in the latter year. He married, first, 14th Feb., 1815, Catherine Juliana, eldest daughter and co-heir of the late Sir Hugh Bateman, Bart., of Hartington Hall, county Derby, and had by her (who died 4th August, 1847) three sons, the eldest of whom, Sir Frances Edward Scott, inherited at his birth a Baronetcy conferred upon his maternal grandfather, and now succeeds, in addition, to his father's title. Sir Edward married, secondly, 4th Nov., 1848, Lydia, widow of the Rev. Edmund Robinson, of Thorpe Green, county York, and daughter of the late Thomas Gisborne, Esq., of Yoxall Lodge.

SIR WILLIAM BRYAN COOKE, BART.

THIS worthy Baronet died on the 23d ultimo, in his 59th year. He was the 8th inheritor of the title, which was conferred after the Restoration on George Cooke, Esq., of Deane, in consideration of his own and his father's loyalty and sufferings during the Civil War. The family seat has long been at Wheatley Hall, near Doncaster.

Sir William married, 8th April, 1823, Cecilia Vivian, younnest daughter of the late Sir William Middleton, Bart., of Belsay Castle, Northumberland, and leaves two sons and one surviving daughter. Of the former, the elder, the present Sir William Ridley Charles Cooke, 9th Baronet of Wheatley, was born 5th Oct., 1827.

CHARLES ELDER, ESQ.

THE premature death of this young and gifted artist, which occurred on the 11th ult., at his residence in Cover-street, after a few hours illness, is much and deeply lamented. Mr. Elder had not attained his 31st year, but, as an historical and portrait painter, he had already gained considerable reputation. Among his best efforts, we may call to mind productions of a large size, made to represent the Mary meeting Our Saviour in the garden after the Resurrection; "The Invitation: Come unto me all ye that labour;" "The Destroying Angel stayed by Mercy;" "Ruth gleaning in the fields of Boaz;" and many other Scriptural pieces. "The Death of Marc Antony," "Rosalind," "The Weary Travellers," &c., were also very fine specimens of his genius. As a portrait painter, he was eminently successful in the representation of George Cook, Esq., of Bristol, and Charles Kean, Esq., as the

NEW GIFT-BOOK FOR THE SEASON.
Just published, crown 8vo, price 16s, elegantly bound,
THE LANSDOWNE SHAKESPEARE Being a beautiful Miniature Edition of Shakespeare, a household book, perfectly unique in the annals of printing, and dedicated, by express permission, to the Most Noble the Marquis of Lansdowne, nearly 40 sound copies have been sold within the first few days of its publication
It has been produced regardless of cost in order that it may take a permanent position as a gentleman's handbook abroad and a Gravingroom table, at home. Its Characteristics will be found in uniting with its portability a clearness and facility in reading hitherto unattained in any impression
Caliber's text has been most carefully compared and revised, and for the first time in any edition of Shakespeare the stage directions are distinguished by being printed in red ink, and so are the names of the speakers, which appear for the first time at the beginning of the first line of a speech in an abridged form, as heretofore, but in a distinct line above each speech in the centre of the column. In this way, as it is remarked by the "Times" reviewer, the inconvenience of searching for the reading of a compressed type is almost entirely obviated, thus rendering this edition more convenient, for general study or reference, than any other.

THE GREAT EXHIBITION.

FLORA'S FOUNTAIN, AND "THE SULTANA."—BY EUGENE RIMMEL.

HALL-TABLE, ETC.—BY MILLS, BRADFORD.

This fountain of toilet vinegar (a new and delightful substitute for eau de Cologne) was exhibited by Mr. Rimmel, the perfumer, of Gerrard-street, and was kept playing every day throughout the Exhibition, proving a great attraction to the fair visitors. "The Sultana," exhibited by the same house, is a most splendid specimen of the kind, ornamented with a pretty painting on silk, and emitting a delightful odour. It is used for perfuming handkerchiefs, gloves, &c.

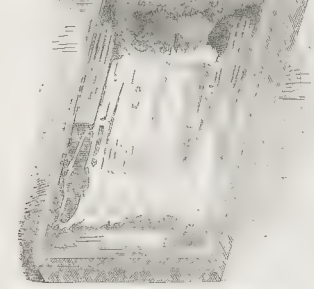
LADY'S SHOES, &c. BY GODFREY AND HANCOCK

Amongst the admirable specimens of shoes and slippers exhibited by Godfrey and Hancock, of Conduit-street, were a most beautiful pair of slippers, made for her Majesty. They are composed of black silk velvet, richly embroidered in gold, with the Royal arms; they are lined with white satin, have appropriate coloured satin heels, and the tops are decorated with gold trimmings. They are exquisitely finished. Our Engraving also represents some richly embroidered ladies' blue and green velvet boots, showing undoubted superiority of workmanship.

HER MAJESTY'S DRESSING SLIPPERS. BY GODFREY AND HANCOCK, CONDUIT-STREET.

ILLUSTRATIONS OF GLOVE-MAKING. BY E. WHITBY, OF YEOVIL.

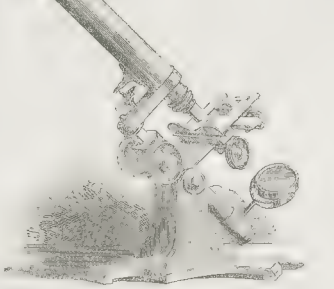
Mr. E. Whitby, jun., glove-manufacturer, of Yeovil, obtained a prize for "lambskin gloves," usually sold as kid. His case contained an illustration of the process of glove manufacturing, showing the skin in its various stages. One portion of the skin was in the raw state, as imported from Italy; another portion was partly manufactured into leather; another portion was completely made into leather, out of which was cut one pair of ladies' white gloves, and one of the gloves was in a finished state. No portion, from the raw skin to the finished glove, was detached. The Royal Commissioners have done Mr. Whitby the honour of accepting the skin, to be preserved as a specimen of the Exhibition.



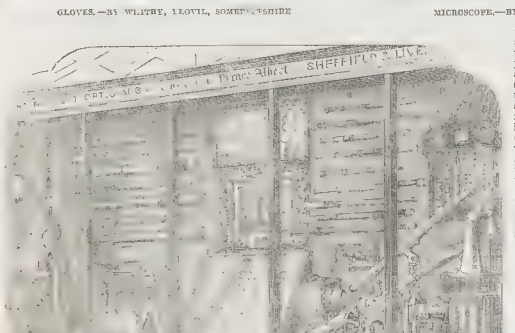
GLOVES.—BY WHITBY, YEOVIL, SOMERSETSHIRE.

LADD'S IMPROVED MICROSCOPE ADJUSTMENTS.

We present our readers with a view of the Microscope to which we have before called attention, No. 486, and for which the inventor, Mr. Ladd, of Walworth, has received honourable mention from the jury of Class X. No person who has used the Microscope can have failed to experience the difficulty which in all ordinary instruments prevents that nicety of adjustment essential to microscopic observation. This arises from the motion of the tube depending upon a rack and pinion, which, from their nature, it is scarcely possible to make to work with smoothness and accuracy; and even in the best instruments the parts are speedily worn, producing that unsteady motion known as "loss of time." The inventor has overcome this objection by employing a steel fusee chain in lieu of the rack, and substituting a steel pin or axis for the pinion: the chain, passing two or three times round the axis, is attached at each end of the sliding bar supporting the body of the microscope; the axis, furnished with a milled head, is made to revolve as in the rack and pinion, of course carrying the tube with it. Similar movements are applied by the inventor to the moveable stages, superseding the old rack-work as well as the screw, thus obtaining an equal rate of motion in both directions in considerably less space. These improvements, economising labour, and rendering unnecessary, in most instances, the supplementary "fine adjustment," will afford an uniform steady motion without the possibility of loss of time, while the friction is so slight that the wear of years will not be perceived; thus reducing the cost of this valuable instrument, so necessary to the investigation of every branch of the physical sciences.



MICROSCOPE.—BY W. LADD, WALWORTH.



PHILOSOPHICAL AND OPTICAL INSTRUMENTS.—BY MESSRS. CHADBURN, OF LIVERPOOL.

HALL-TABLE, HAT AND UMBRELLA STAND. BY MILLS, BRADFORD

There is considerable novelty and ingenuity in the design of this useful article of furniture. The graceful scrolls are gratifying to the eye, while the several combinations of great utility must render it a favourite in all well-regulated establishments. The Chair displays a light and graceful form well adapted for drawingrooms.

PHILOSOPHICAL AND OPTICAL INSTRUMENTS. BY MESSRS CHADBURN, OF LIVERPOOL.

Our Engraving represents the case of optical instruments exhibited by Messrs. Chadburn, of Liverpool, perhaps the most varied and general collection of the kind in the whole Exhibition. Amongst the more striking objects is an improved day and night telescope for nautical purposes, the power of which can be varied according to circumstances. Near it is an improved portable achromatic telescope, the centre tube of which is ornamented by a new process. The rest of the collection comprises every description of optical and philosophical instruments, from an improved registered barometer, and a variety of magic lanterns and Daguerréotype apparatus, down to the ordinary spectacles, of which a large assortment is provided, to suit every kind of sight.

OUR GREAT EXHIBITION CORRESPONDENCE.—No. II.

MACHINE-PRINTED PAPERHANGINGS.—We endeavour as much as possible to avoid making ourselves up in the jealousies and conflicting pretensions of rivals in trade, and generally, we hope, have been successful. In some few cases however, complaints have been addressed to us, and in so boisterous a tone, by interested parties, that we feel compelled to take some notice of them, lest we should be suspected of wishing to shirk a difficulty. Messrs. C. H. and E. Potter, for instance, write bitterly to complain of a passage in one of our articles on the Jury Awards, in which we state that "the very important and new application of machinery for printing paperhangings, by Messrs. Heywood, Higginbotham, and Co., was passed over with only honourable mention." Messrs. C. H. and E. Potter object to these complimentary expressions as applied to their rivals, and contend that they "were the first and sole to apply machinery to printing paperhangings; that this they did twelve years ago, and did it better ten years ago than H., H., and Co. do it now." They then make an allegation as to some one formerly in their employ having left them, and entered into partnership with H., H., and Co., appending some comments which we need not repeat. They (Messrs. Potter) then go on to say, which we repeat in justice to ourselves, "we are aware that Heywood and Co. have, by advertisements, &c., introduced many to think they were the inventors and introducers" of this process, but "never deemed it worthy our notice till you proclaimed them in the columns of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS." With all these allegations we have nothing to do; it is sufficient that we let Messrs. Potter and Co. state their case in our columns; and, having done so, we must state our opinion that the samples exhibited by Heywood and Co. were of a superior order, as regarded taste and execution, to those of Messrs. Potter. And, as to the process having been first, they were produced, however the case might have been with regard to years ago, it appears certainly to be a fact, that Messrs. Heywood and Co. have paid to print an hundred to one of ours, with fourteen different colours, the largest number previously attained with them.

DIVING APPARATUS.—In our supplement of the 22d November we gave an Engraving and description of Siebe's diving apparatus, which is very similar to that of Mr. Deane, who states that he was, in connexion with his deceased brother, the original inventor of this apparatus, and by its aid brought up the guns and other articles from the Royal George, in the years 1834-5-6. It appears that it was Mr. Deane's not Mr. Siebe's, which was exhibited in operation in the glass case. As the case of many instances of the inaccurate classification of the Illustrated Official Catalogue, and for the guidance of all interested in these inventions, we may state that Mr. Deane's diving apparatus is No. 446 of class 5, and Mr. Siebe's No. 1 of class 7.

THE BATTLE SEA PIECES.—We agree entirely in the justness of the complaint contained in the following letter, which cannot be better expressed than in the language of the writer:—"Sir, The complaints and claims of other exhibitors in your widely read Journal, especially since you profess to be the champion of neglected merit in so generous a manner, have led me to prefer mine, being an exhibitor, although unrecorded as such in either Official Catalogue (!), notwithstanding that copies descriptive of the article, and specifying myself as exhibitor and proprietor, were forwarded in three languages, in my own name, to the secretaries. I claim, however, nothing personally as a mere exhibitor, but rely upon the merit of the objects exhibited. My complaint is, that what I exhibited, especially as a trophy of my mother's labours, in a cause tending solely to benefit the community, should pass unnoticed and unrewarded. Surely the public and the press will not tell me that the specimens of silk sent by Mrs. Whitby (of Newlands, in the county of Southampton) in the cultivation of silk on her own estate, deserved some public acknowledgement. Surely the nurture of worms and feeding of worms, and reeling of silk, accomplished by that lady with unpersonal trouble and patience, were sufficiently indicated at the beautiful banner, fresh from the looms of Messrs. Houldsworth, and occupying a space in their compartments, which is just withdrawn from the Crystal Palace. Surely that banner was in itself sufficient guarantee for the success of silk culture in Britain—a novel venture first and boldly carried out by a lady, and for the hope the daughter might not unreasonably have entertained, that to her would have been awarded the medal that was to crown a parent's posthumous triumph. It is with a strong sense of disappointment at having been passed over, that I commit these few lines to you; and I have the honour to remain, Sir, your obedient, humble servant, R. J. WEBB.—Newlands, Lymington, Hants, Nov., 1851."

DUCROQUET'S ORGAN.—Bertha compliments us so gracefully for "the urbanity and kindness of our replies to correspondents," that we regret we cannot give a satisfactory answer to her question as to the whereabouts of "the individual who played so admirably on the French organ situated in the Nave." He is probably in Paris, playing still, unless he has been silenced with the other "organs" in that "tranquil" capital.

IRON BRIDGE OVER THE WYE.—In our third notice on the Great Exhibition awards (Nov. 15), we stated, with reference to civil engineering, architectural, and building contrivances—"There are in all only three council medals and twenty-three prize medals earned by the whole body of exhibitors in this comprehensive department, and these are chiefly for models of works long since accomplished, as the Plymouth Breakwater, Strasburg Cathedral, the cast-iron bridge over the Wye, &c." It appears that we fell into error in the case of the Wye Bridge, which is of wrought iron, and the works of which are still in progress, under Messrs. Finch and Wiley, from the designs of Mr. J. K. Brunel. It is intended to carry the South Wales Railway over the river Wye.

HORSE-SHOES "A Mechanic" complains, we think, very fairly, of injustice having been done to the Horse-shoe interest by the Jury of Class 22 (Genera. Hardware). He says: "There were several exhibitors of that most useful article, and one which requires much scientific as well as mechanical skill to produce. I find in looking over the awards, that buttons, cooperivets, and several other articles produced by machinery, have a medal awarded; but the horse-shoes have only 'honourable mention.' In the manufacture of a horse-shoe every blow of the hammer must be properly placed and have a meaning, and every hole must be properly pitched to receive the nails, or the shoe cannot with safety be applied to the living foot of the horse. The old adage may be said to apply in this case, 'out of sight out of mind;' but although horse-shoes may be save to prove, in the mind, the contributions and visitors would have had some little difficulty in getting to the Crystal Palace without the aid of the humble horse-shoe."

R. RETTIE. This correspondent must really excuse us. If he has any complaint to make, at him address it to the compiler of the Official Catalogue, for announcing, as we did, E. M. and M. Rettie, of Aberdeen, were manufacturers of Victoria Signal Lights. As to their right to do so, that is no business of ours. The catalogue compiler again affords an instance of confused classification in the case before us. R. Rettie of Edinburgh, as found in Class 7, No. 158; E. M. and M. Rettie, of Aberdeen, are in Class 22, No. 449, both exhibit signal lights and the same engraving serves to illustrate both.

In our description of the Invalid Couch and Bed, engraved Oct. 11, the maker's name was erroneously spelt "Minton," instead of Munter.

The Inlaid Table, engraved and described Oct. 25th, was by Holland and Son, of London, not "of Warwick."

WOOD-CARVING.—In our remarks respecting the carving of the Kenilworth Buffet, we mentioned Mr. Walter Cooper as having introduced a "novelty" to wood-carving, instead of which it should have been Mr. Walter Cooke, of Warwick. The same error exists in the Official Illustrated Catalogue, from which we took the name.

THE CUT PILE VELVET CARPET, engraved in our Supplement November 22nd, was erroneously described as exhibited by Brinton and Son, Kidderminster, whereas it was exhibited by Shiver, of Cheltenham, the design consisting of oak acorns, &c., being the design of Mrs. Shiver. The carpet was manufactured for Mr Shiver by Brinton and Sons.

M. R. G., St. Petersburg, had better address his inquiries to M. D. Wyatt, Esq., the Secretary of the Executive Committee.

THE CANDLESTICK of carved wood and ivory engraved in our Supplement of Sept. 6th should have been described as by "W. D. Hemphill, M. D., of Clonmel," not "Kemphil."

PEARLS.—In our article on Pearls (4th Oct.) it is stated that the finest known pearl was exhibited in the showcase of Messrs. Hunt and Roskell of the Great Exhibition. This, we are informed, is a mistake; the pearl alluded to, of a pear shape, formerly the property of Queen Isabella of Castile, having been exhibited by Messrs Garrard.

DUCTILITY OF GOLD.—In our notice of the case of Messrs. Barrett and Carney (Oct. 11) we observed, "There is evidently some error in the account of the length to which gold extends upon wire shown." In reference to this Messrs. Barrett write as follows:—"We beg to say our statement is quite correct: viz. 'One grain extended upon the wire actually measures at the rate of 338.4.0 yards, or 1½ miles, per ounce troy.' You leave out the words 'extended upon the wire,' which leaves it to be implied the wire is solid metal, whereas it is only silver gilt. Our object in calling attention to the extraordinary length to which gold is drawn was to show its ductility, but we by no means intended to state that solid gold is drawn to a length of nearly 200 miles per ounce troy, though we believe that even could be accomplished."

A HANDFUL OF CHILDREN'S BOOKS.*

"CHRISTMAS comes but once a year," and with it come the youngsters from school, and with it comes a vast production of toys and sweetmeats, and gaudily-dressed literature for their especial delectation. With the toys and the sweetmeats we have nothing to do at present: we have had our fair share of them in our day, and must fairly admit that it would be a piece of gross affectation to pretend to have any aptitude or relish for them; but albeit we from time to time have beheld many notable examples of men many winters in advance of us trying to do the funny with the juveniles, spring surprise and gladness of heart at the antics of the new Punchinello, and joining with inordinate vivacity in the rough-est gambols (in which feat they have acquitted themselves much after the fashion of the bull's celebrated performances in a china-shop), and all this out of compliment to mamma, the amiable hostess, or, perhaps way of exemplifying to papa the generous influence of his "ancient old port"; but albeit we from time to time have beheld many notable examples of men many winters in advance of us trying to do the funny with the juveniles, we have never acquitted ourselves much after the fashion of the bull's celebrated performances in a china-shop), and all this out of compliment to mamma, the amiable hostess, or, perhaps way of exemplifying to papa the generous influence of his "ancient old port"; but always, we apprehend, very much to their own disparagement in their moments of "sober" reflection, and certainly very much to our annoyance and mental discomfort at the time. No; in spite of the example of the "overgrown," we are convinced there is a time for all things; and that in all periods of life, whilst we all have our respective enjoyments, we all, the youngest with the eldest, have our resative duties. Our duty, as we become men, is to put away childish things: to put off childish behaviour and childish indulgences. Not that we would austerely repress the natural sports of childhood, confined to their own spheres: that would be as ce-tain to assume them in our own persons would be ridiculous and ill-timed, but merely that, when we are among the youngsters, we should enter heartily into their pleasures, and participate in them in advance by giving them a glimpse at more rational, lasting enjoyment, upon which, in a few years—ay! how very few—they may be legitimately called upon to enter. In a word, we would teach youth, whilst he enjoys the present, to prepare his resources for future enjoyment: and, above all, teach him to respect his elders, by showing him how, with every additional year of life, he may increase his own self-respect.

And this brings us back to our "Handful of Children's Books." Yes, though we have outgrown the attraction of tarts and toys, of lollypops and popguns, let us not think it beneath the dignity of criticism to examine the literature of childhood—to scrutinise the doctrines and examples set forth in it; and which, imbibed thus early in a virgin soil, will have an enduring influence upon the future predilections, tendencies, and ideas of the members of a world which is to succeed us. This is a subject which has only recently, speaking relatively, come in for a share of our attention, yet already with appreciable advantage. In the good old times of our papas and grandfathers, the usual practice with a little boy "home for the holidays" was to stuff him up to the chin with turkey, plum-pudding, and sweetmeats; then frighten him out of his wits with a good story of ghosts and hobgoblins, and send him to bed, to sleep, "perchance to dream," under the horrible influence of a physical and mental indigestion. All very wrong, as was frequently admitted by the good easy mamma, sister, or aunt, but always with this consolatory reflection, that it would all be starved and parched out of him when he went back to school. At school the mythology of classicism was added to the mythology of the nursery; pockets money, selfishly expended, kept alive the sensual spirit of the Christmas gorge; and so in a hotbed of false ideas and pampered appetites the future heroes and statesmen of England sprouted as they might. The only wonder is they came so well out of it.

Touching the pocket money and the gluttony, ay, and the heathen mythology, we have not a word to say at present: the theme is too vast, too diversified for our present purpose. But for the goblin-lore, which once formed the staple literature of our nurseries, we believe it has been gradually abandoned within the last fifty years for a less exciting and less pernicious diet; and most fortunately so for the future happiness of the little helpless mortals who have escaped from its influence. We exaggerate in nothing when we state that "Jack the Giant-Killer," "Little Red Riding Hood," "Blue Beard," and other monstrous concoctions of this order, have sowed the seeds of mental misery and mental weakness in many a child of mild and susceptible temperament, and exposed the victim, even in after years, to a sea of vague terrors, which, though through shame, often unacknowledged to the world, have hung not the less heavily as a nightmare upon the faculties, adding unnatural gloom to the shadows of evening, and begetting a habit of superstitious musgiving utterly destructive of healthful elasticity and cheerfulness of spirit.

Yes, the giant-lore and the witch-lore are exploded, and with them is gone that vulgar war-cry of tawdry nurse-maid, "Bogie's coming!" which has sent many a young urchin's heart into his mouth, and his whole frame into a cruel cold perspiration. Thank Heaven, this mental murder is at an end, and children are beginning at last to be treated like rational beings—rational in the same sense, if not in equal degree, as their seniors.

Amongst the homely names whom we still hold sacred in our memories, as soothers and instructors of our youth, are those of Barbauld, Trimmer, Day, and Holland. And, pardon us, respected, full-grown reader, if we, even now, cast back our lingering glance at the adventures of our young friend "Frank," and of the "little dog Trusty," who so narrowly escaped an unmerited flogging, from which he was saved by a timely word of truth; and to the "Cherry Orchard" which a whole colony of young folks of both sexes, from one up to nine years of age, earned by straw-plaiting for the purchase of a donkey and "Sandford and Merton," whose adventures are full of instructive examples. And "Little Henry and his Bearer," a most touching narrative of the conversion to religious truth of a poor black Negro by the sickly deathbed of a little child whom it was his business to tend; and of the "Son of a Genius," a story of sterling merit, illustrating the superior and more prevailing virtue of persevering cheerful industry, as contrasted with the fitful and capricious achievements of "genius," real or presumed; and, lastly, to that generous, noble-hearted little hero the "Ellen the Teacher," none of your sickly sentimental "——" of the green-room, and green-eyed melancholy school, but a creature ... fit to good sense and good-heartedness, proud of her every ... acquirement, for the opportunity it afforded her of imparting ... to others: proud, also, of her modest stipend, which rightly ... did such wonders at home—happy in the sustaining smiles of firm approving friends.

Pardon us, gentle reader, that we thus "go o'er the stories of our youth." If you doubt their potent spell, read them; and if you have children, let them read them also. After this digression, we proceed to explore the contents of our "Handful of Children's Books," ... decked out in crimson and blue and gold, and abounding in ... tinted engravings, court the notice of holiday folks of this annus 185-.

"The Doll and her Friends[1]" and both not a doll friends, and many, too! How many a ... in her splendour of appearance ... how many a ... sympathy at her unmerited wrongs ... proved for ... counterfeit of humanity? The doll hath her enemies, too; persecuting, unrelentless, ruthless boys, who seem to delight in the torturing and slaughter of dolls, for the very grief and terror it occasions their owners.

This little book comes as a sort of plea for the doll against such barbarities as these, and seeks to establish a locus standi for dolls, upon the ... and ... belt, as ... though they be, they have ... upon which ... Also, upon the whole, we think the champion has made out a very fair case for them. But, whether or not, she has certainly made the doll the medium of introducing us to some very pleasing and instructive passages in the republic of the nursery and the school-room. The grand object held in view throughout is to temper the feelings and soften the manners of the selfish and the rude, and to impress upon all the importance of mutual forbearance, and respect for the rights and feelings of others. The narrative is written in a very sprightly style, as may be seen by the sample we give, being the early days of a "Sixpenny Doll," before she has emerged from the shop into society——

But now that they were all gone, and I never could hope to see them again, I would gladly have squeezed myself into as small compass as the baby doll in the walnut-shell, in order to make room for them once more.

I was as usual employed in making remarks upon the passing crowd, and wondering what might be the use of every body I saw, when I perceived the lady and the little girl who had formed such acquaintances among the human race. As they approached my ... I heard the mamma say, "Have you decided what to buy with the sixpence.

> "Oh yes, quite," answered the child; "I am going to buy a sixpenny doll."
> The words thrilled through me; her eyes seemed fixed on mine, and the sixpence was between her fingers. I imagined myself bought. But she continued: "I think, if you don't mind the trouble, I should like to go round the bazaar first, to see which are the prettiest."
> "By all means," replied the lady; and they walked on, carrying all my hopes with them.

> They came nearer—they stopped at another stall; I could not hear what they said, but they turned away, and once more stood opposite to me. The child remained for some moments as silent as myself, and then exclaimed, "After all, mamma, I don't think there is a prettier doll in the whole room."
> "What do you say to this, miss?" said our proprietor, taking up a great full-dressed Dutch doll, and giving her on the top of those of my size and class, complete, hiding the poor little creature under her abundant flounces.
> But on the child's answering, "No, thank you, I only want a sixpenny doll not dressed," the Dutch giantess was removed, and we once more asserted our humble claims.
> "That seems to me a very pretty one," said the mamma, pointing to my next neighbour. The child for a moment hesitated, but presently exclaimed in a joyful tone, "Oh no; this is the beauty of all; that little darling with the red hair and blue ribbon in it; I will take this one, if you please." And before I could be sure that she meant me I was removed from my place, wrapped up in paper, and consigned to her hands. My long-cherished wishes were fulfilled, and I was bought. At first I could scarcely believe it. Notwithstanding all my planning and looking forward to this event, now that it really happened, I could not realise it. My senses seemed gone. What had so long occupied my mind was the work of a moment, but that moment was irrevocable, and my fate was decided. In my little mistress's hands I passed the boundaries of the world of toys, and entered upon a new state of existence.

It is the first inkling of the evil spirit of vagabondage, and of the repugnance to discipline which so many "anxious parents" contend against in vain. Is there any occasion to minister to this appetite? Without at all disparaging the importance of our sea service—martial and commercial—and the noble character of our jolly tars, we must most of us allow that it is not exactly the line of life we should select for our sons (unless with very good prospect of promotion); and that at any rate it is not the most eligible sphere for a man of education. Yet we find one of the principal characters in the present volume, a ... captain, introduced with the following ... antecedents: "He had had, fortunately, the opportunity of ... excellent education (he is left a orphan at fourteen), and ... had profited by it; and this gave him a ... independence of feeling which he could not otherwise easily have enjoyed. He was also a lad of honest spirit. His relatives had quarrelled with ... parents, and treated them, ... deered, unjustly, so that his ... rebelled at the idea of soliciting charity from them, and he at once ... resolved to fight for his own ... on board a vessel trading to the Baltic, and next made a voyage to Baffin's Bay in a whaler; after which he joined an Indiaman."

There are other points upon which we cannot concur with the author, and which we consider ill-timed when addressed to youths of fifteen and sixteen; as, for instance, comparisons between the colonial policy of England and that of the Dutch and other countries, always highly laudatory of ourselves, and condemnatory of our neighbours, but unfortunately very frequently upon grounds which, according to vulgar phraseology, will not "hold water." We are afraid, indeed, that when our account comes to be cast up it will be found that as a nation we have taken as little care about the social condition of the native population of our colonies, with a view to their civilization, as any colonizing nation in the world.

We will conclude with only one instance of what we may fairly call careless writing, containing much of truth, with the addition of much calculator, to lead to error. Of the Cape it is said

"It is on many accounts a very valuable colony to Great Britain, and, among others, because it is on the high road to her extensive possessions in the East Indies and Australasia, and that in its harbours the numerous shipping which sail thither may find shelter in time of war, and at all times may replenish their water and provisions. Were it in the hands of an enemy, they would seriously annoy, if not destroy, our commerce with those regions;—but——"

Now down to this "but" we have no objection, saving only that something might have been said of the extreme costliness of this "important" rather than "valuable" colony: but, when we are told "but on other considerations it is still more valuable," we pause ... look for the data of so extraordinary an assertion. The pause ... and ... "It affords a home to thousands of our countrymen, and it imports ... the raw material, wool, to our manufactories, and its inhabitants, by using a large quantity ... [illegible] ... goods of our own, and to all other ... [illegible] ... goods of persons at home, who would otherwise ... [illegible] ...

To prove the value of these commodities, a few figures may assist. The whole white population of this colony amounts to about 85,000, or little more than the half-are of Belgian origin. The quantity of wool supplied by it to our manufacturers was, in 1849, 5 millions of pounds, out of a total importation of 70 millions of pounds—of which cross amount Australia supplied 36 millions. The value of British produce and manufactures imported for consumption in Cape Colony has varied in the last ten years from £3,000,000 to £6,000,000 a year; and, during the same period, the imports from other countries, who pay no part of the expense of the government of the colony, have been nearly half the amount of those from the mother country. Finally, so very valuable is this colony considered by many of the political economists of the present day, including some of the Manchester school, that it has been seriously in contemplation to abandon it, rather than keep up the cost of some ten or fifteen thousand troops to hold it against the Kaffirs.

We must, in justice, add that Mr Kingston's volume contains several passages of considerable graphic power, including descriptions of many scenes amongst the islands in the Indian Ocean which do not occur in the every-day beat of travellers to the East.

LORD GEORGE BENTINCK: a Political Biography. By B. DISRAELI, Member of Parliament for the County of Buckingham. Colburn and Co. 18—.

We could have wished that the "Member of Parliament for the county of Buckingham," after writing a book of which, of course, he was himself implicated to do—had thrown it into the fire, or at least had adopted Horace's advice, and condemned it to the shelf for seven years. In the bitter case we are convinced that even the author would have become painfully aware of the bad taste displayed in it, whilst we are equally certain that the party for which he he ongs would have seen the impolicy, upon party grounds, not to speak of any other, of raking up the débris of ancient conflict which, whilst it resulted in the defeat of one party in conflicts generally do did so under circumstances of peculiar, no honour upon, nor obtained any permanent advantage for, the other. Let the surviving actors in it, not yet cool from the fray, talk of it as they please, we are satisfied that the majority of the country look upon the "Opposition" of 1841 as the most factious, the most unpatriotic, and, upon all accounts, the least creditable to the character of Parliament that this country has ever witnessed; and more, we might almost venture to say, that the impromptu "statesman," who was deluded and cajoled into taking the leadership of that Opposition, would ere this, had he lived, have seen the case in the same light—have been ashamed of the selfish and stupid cause he was set forward to discourse about, and, with that spirit and high-mindedness which so eminently marked his character, have honestly recanted—perhaps, bitterly repenting—the errors of which he had been made the victim. "I don't pretend to know much," said Lord George to the author of this volume; "but I can judge of men and horses." Poor Lord George! he had better have stuck to the horses.

But it was not doomed so to be. The landed gentry were in a state of consternation at the anti-Protectionist policy of Peel; and, though ill at ease in their own company and strong in conviction, there was no one to do the battle of words with the "renegade"—no one who knew anything about the matter—we mean the facts of the matter. Appealed to by the "Protectionists" and the united voices of the Agricultural Associations, Lord George Bentinck consented to stand forward to defend their cause; his heart was with them and their cause; he was possessed of undoubted "pluck;" and all he wanted was a little information upon the points of the questions likely to be the subject of debate discussion, and this was readily supplied him. Still he had some misgiving as to his personal, but more his physical abilities; and we learn from these pages that, at the last moment, he actually entered into negotiations to procure a member of the bar, who was to be put in for some handy borough, to argue the case from the brief which his (Lord George) had prepared. Can a more humiliating confession be imagined, out of the region of the Old Bailey, than that involved in the [illegible] of Protectionist "leader," the member of Parliament for the county of Buckingham? The barrister was not obtained, however; and Lord George Bentinck, after having "sate in eight Parliaments without having taken part in any great debate," made his celebrated three hours' speech in support of the Corn-laws, which, for the most part, was inaudible to the House, but, being prepared in MS. beforehand, was printed at length in the papers next morning.

Such was the sudden growth, such the début, of the new "statesman" who was put forward to contest the policy of a Minister who had seen nearly forty years of public service, and to whom the details of all the experience of that period—to say nothing of a previous political education—were as familiar as A B C.

It is really painful to think of any man putting himself in such a position; it is painful to reflect upon the existence of a "great country party" consenting to avow their own ignorance and inability, by tacking themselves behind such an champion as the author of this volume; more painfully in the picture presented by the whole of this notable combination.

Many time the labours of the devoted leader were of no ordinary nature—taking with reference to his position in society and the life to which he had been accustomed they may be pronounced herculean. He was truly devoted to the cause, which he honestly believed to be the cause of "the landed interest, and therefore of the country with its political tenets marked in bold and unchanging characters before him, he was daily occupied in collecting and digesting facts to establish those foregone conclusions. These conclusions embraced almost every branch of political economy, though not generally in the light which the true philosophy of that science had established; such as, that land was the best customer of manufactures; that foreign competition was to be shut out; that a restricted trade with a poor colony was preferable to an extended trade with an independent foreign state; that £1 kept at home was worth thirty sent abroad; that the Currency-laws were all bad because they were Peel's; that the best interests of the country were those of labour; that railways were the most profitable works upon which labour could be employed, even though there were no traffic for them when made. These, and sundry other cases, had he to get up in the brief space of a couple of sessions, besides others of a constitutional nature, as the Irish disturbances question, the Catholic question, the Jewish question, the Slave question, &c.

Those who have seen two lawyers pitted against one another in a court of law, with each a ponderous brief full of "facts," know how easy it is to make out a case upon any given side of a question, and need not be surprised to learn that Lord George Bentinck, in setting forth upon his new career in life, found plenty of friends to supply him with "information," "returns," &c. That such was the case, that such had been the course of proceeding, and that every two-hour speech made by the new Protectionist leader was the result of eighteen or twenty hours' hard cramming, was pretty apparent upon the face of the affair, and was not denied either by himself or his friends. But, if this was unavoidable in a case of great straits and urgent necessity, we think that the friendly friends would have shown his taste by not bringing the palpable proofs of all this daily and ignoble drudgery before the world, leaving posterity to judge of the performance itself, without reference to the stage directions and rehearsals. But Mr. Disraeli considered this. He seems to be proud of showing how quickly education upon "Protectionist principles" may be acquired by any one—that is, any one already having faith and a mind proof against disturbing influences; for, after quoting some passages from the noble champion's earlier speeches, he makes the following remark:—

"The reader will have observed, in the splendid passages which have just been given from his speeches, more than one characteristic trait of the newly-adopted habits of his life, by which he acquired and so rapidly such sound and such extensive information on such various and varying subjects. The first merchants and manufacturers of the country were the companions of his mornings, and from an early hour, to the time when it was necessary to appear in his place, he was occupied in investigating, with their assistance, the questions affecting the commerce and industry of the country then submitted to the legislature. The gentleman who had omitted on him that morning was sure to be about the best authority on the subject in debate."

There is something too absurd in this to need comment. The passage speaks, not as Lord George Bentinck did it speaks for itself—no anecdotage does the noble Lord's memory prompt by way of text to be of the obvious import of this revelation, that he publishes some score of letters written by the new-fledged Protectionist leader, addressed to various friendly counsellors, and all making urgent appeals for "more facts" upon which to base the arguments of the coming debate—facts about exports and imports, the currency, &c., which any one conversant with M'Culloch's "Commercial Dictionary," or the most ordinary Blue Books, would have been at no loss to find for himself. The sense manifested in these applications would be incredible in any other man; but the fact was, the chosen champion of the Protectionists was strong in not knowing the extent of his own ignorance or theirs. He could never have undertaken the task and gone through it as he did, if he had known all he had to learn. In the midst of one letter of four pages (Nov. 11, 1847), full of inquiries and crude theor s about the colonial trade—drawn up very much in the style of what Cobbett's sawyer lawyers would call "a fishing bill"—addressed to a learned gentleman at Liverpool (the author, it appears, of sundry "Glances" at various branches of political economy), he says, "If it is not abusing your willing courtesy, I should like very much to be practically instructed on the various points on which I have treated in this letter. One other point I would inquire about," &c. And he concludes: "This strong consolation I have on this subject must plead my excuse to you for presuming to tax your time, which I know is your income and fortune, by asking you so much information."

To another very profound pamphleteer he writes, Nov. 26, 1847: "I wish you would publish a new edition of your old pamphlet, reviewing the late occurrences and disasters. I can only say that I never fairly understood the question (the Bank Charter question) until I had read your former pamphlet!"

In another letter (Dec. 4, 1847) he says:—"Mr. Heywood, your member, has chanced to me to show that England has not gained by the transfer of the sugar trade from our own colonies to the foreigners, and I have accepted his challenge, and dug upon your fruitless to excavate the information. I bring forward my motion on Thursday."

We need not extend these examples: they abound in the volume for the gratification of the curiosity of those who are anxious about the question. "How little knowledge is taken to govern a great nation," or, at least, to affect the direction of its destinies for a season! We regret to add that some of the correspondences here published to the world is not of an equally innocent character, evincing a rancour of party spirit, and a determination, to achieve its end—"the end" at last being the pis aller of Shylock—"revenge," regardless of the means resorted to in its attainment. As for the "policy" of the "party" at whose head he marched, and the most painful incidents of the contest itself, we have no desire to renew them now. Enough is taken to disturb ghosts over them, even now in the day that both the combatants have been suddenly, unexpectedly snatched from the scene of their strife. Mr. Disraeli sees no indecency in publishing the letters recording the daily manœuvres of this campaign-warfare, plainly avowing that the Minister of the day was to be got out, no matter by what means, even to the confessing with a still more extreme opponent, and the rescinding of a vote given the stultification of a political profession pledged not three months before—that favour of the Irish Disturbances Suppression Bill. We have read these revelations with great pain and astonishment, for they betray the sins of the fleets of slavers prior to their departure for what is called the Coast. It is a religious frenzy might be worked up out of these blasphemous things. I want to get the picture into the ILLUSTRATED NEWS.

We have only to add, that the picture did not appear in the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, and that we have no recollection of any application on the subject.

We will say nothing of the chapter volunteered about the late Sir Robert Peel, save that, being dead, the "member of Parliament for the county of Buckingham" appears to think he can "take his measure." The result is—but not refer to the book yourself, reader, if you have any curiosity on the subject. One notable statement only will we quote—and that is, that, "for so very clever a man, he (Sir Robert Peel) was deficient in the knowledge of human nature!" This is so genuine, so characteristic, that if true it would settle and explain everything in the career of that [illegible] statesman. We do, however, think it impertinent—we say much of "human nature," that he never trusted any man with his secrets of policy till he was prepared to carry them out, and never attempted to carry them out, he knew he should succeed.

Of the style in which this "political biography" has been executed, we can only say that it is even worse than the state displayed in the [illegible] of the subject matter. Tediously cumbersome in the [illegible], like an overgrown "pamphlet" of six hundred pages, the author seeks to make himself at home with his reader by occasionally introducing a lively [illegible] after the following fashion: "The House was [illegible] for the promised detail of circumstances," &c. The awkward speech of Sir Edward Knatchbul was treated very gingerly;" he played on the House of Commons as on an old fiddle;" as the House broke up, at half-past one o'clock, members, they put on their great coats and at their cigars said, 'It is all over, like the cat at last.'" A good deal more of such slang—not slang according to Lindley Murray in construction, is to be met with in sundry pages of the work, but we have lost all patience with it over our notes.

THE NATIONAL ILLUSTRATED LIBRARY.*

Nine volumes of this work now before the public and they already open a very extensive view of the wide field of intellectual study they are intended to [illegible] in a popular and intelligible form. One of this novel character, and certainly the most unique, pieces of biography in our language, and, moreover, one of the most companionable in the literature of any, is now completed in four half-crown volumes. Besides the editorial notes, which are sufficiently copious, being not too prominent, we have that most effective and striking sort of annotation which comes from the hand of the draughtsman abundantly supplied. About two hundred engravings, admirably executed, bring palpably before the eye of the reader the portraiture of various notable personages and interesting localities referred to in the text.

Johnson was undoubtedly one of those worthies of whom our literary annals afford a few distinguished names, whose sayings and doings are well entitled to be embalmed in our memories by every means which literature or art can supply. Whether the Doctor's intellect, and even moral capacious ambition, there was scarcely a subject within the range of moral or intellectual culture which did not at some time or other come within the scope of his observation; and though his opinions were expressed dogmatically, and were not always right, they always threw new and valuable lights upon the field of inquiry, whatever it might chance to be, lights which must ever be of interest and of service in future investigations. No doubt he was a great tyrant in his day, and many a law he laid down was by the mere purpose of asserting an authority which he knew no one dare dispute. Yet it is curious to observe that even when he failed of hitting the right mark, or rather the highest mark, he always hit a true mark. For instance, at a dinner-party, "where were several eminent men" whose names are not known, but distinguishes them merely by different letters, the conversation turned upon "the celebrated antique marble dog, said to be Alcibiades' dog, and valued at a thousand guineas. Exclaims, 'A thousand guineas!' The representation of no animal whatever is worth so much. At this rate a dead dog would indeed be better than a living lion;" a remark which betrayed a great deal of flippancy and ignorance. Johnson observed, "Sir, it is not the worth of the thing, but the skill in forming it, which is so high; estimated everything that enlarges the sphere of human power, or that slows man he can do what he could not do before, is valuable." The first man who balanced a straw upon his nose, Johnson, who rode upon three horses at a time; in short, all such men deserved the applause of mankind, not on account of the use of what they did, but of the dexterity which [illegible] to do it.

Such observation we believe to be true, severely true, inasmuch as we none of us know but that any new acquired accomplishment, however trivial in its present appreciation, may be the means of the discovery of a more ample application to valuable purposes. But a dog dancing to music "whose truth" as regards works of art (which was the case in point), which are not to be esteemed for the difficulty of their execution or the amount of labour bestowed upon them, but for the judgment evinced in the selection of the subject, the manner displayed in its treatment, and, lastly, the physical difficulties overcome in its production.

Taking the p[illegible] we have quoted in connexion with the general tenor of the conversation, we think it must be admitted, that although numerous sides the interrogative bar had not much to offer. There is but one of a hundred observations which will suggest themselves to minds in studying the conversation of this truly great man, and which must all prove more or less interesting and instructive.

Among the more recently published volumes in this collection are Hue's "Travels in Tartary, Tibet, and China" (translated by Mr Hazlitt), and Dumas' "Pictures of Travel in the South of France." The writings of Dumas are always graphic and striking in his travels, of which we have had many, whether real or fictitious. We have to add, in a happy combination of the historical and literary vein, the philosophical, and the [illegible] perhaps a little of the imaginative in all; and these essential qualities of general interest are richly developed in the tour before us, which extends over some of the most picturesque provinces of [illegible] Italy, [illegible] honoured and shining sons. The engravings comprise some of the most exquisite bits of scenery which it is possible for a tourist to explore.

But the work of M. Hue is of higher importance and value, as supplying a vast amount of political information, from recent experience, about immense tracts of country hitherto but little known to us but with which it is essential, perhaps inevitable, that one day or other we should be more intimately acquainted. The origin of this work is thus stated in the preface:—

> The Pope having, about the year 1844, been pleased to establish an Apostolic Vicariat at Mongolia, it was considered expedient, with a view to further the operations, to ascertain the nature and extent of the diocese [illegible], and MM. Gabet and Hue, two Lazarists attached to the petty mission of [illegible], were according[illegible] deputed to collect the necessary information. They made their way through difficulties which nothing but religious enthusiasm in combination with French elasticity could have overcome, to Lha-Ssa, the capital of Thibet, and in this seat of Lamaism were becoming comfortably settled, with live y hopes and expectations of converting the Tale-Lama into a branch-Pope, when the Chinese Minister, the noted Ke-Shen, interposed on political grounds, and had them deported to China. M. Gabet was directed by his superiors to prepare for France, and lay a complaint before his Government of the arbitrary treatment which he and his fellow missionary had experienced. In the steamer which conveyed him from Hong Kong to Ceylon he found Mr. Alexander Johnstone, secretary to our Majesty's Plenipotentiary in China; and this gentleman perceived so much, not merely of entertainment, but of important information, in the conversations he had with M. Gabet, that he committed to paper the leading features of the reverend missionary's statements, and on his return to his official post gave his manuscripts to Sir John Davis, who, in his turn, considered their contents so interesting that he embodied a copy of them in a despatch to Lord Palmerston. Subsequently, the two volumes, here translated, were prepared by M. Hue, and published in Paris. These it is, that to Papal aggression in the east the Western World is indebted for a work exhibiting, for the first time, a complete representation of countries previously a most unknown to Europeans, and indeed considered [illegible] by reasonable and of a religious, which, followed by no fewer than 170,000,000 persons, presents the most singular analogies in its leading features with the Catholic.

The volume before us (the second is not yet published) is embellished with a map of Tartary, Thibet, and China, showing the route of the travellers; and fifty engravings, comprising most striking representations of local scenery, domestic habits, religious practices, costume, &c.

Amongst the volumes announced as forthcoming shortly are Mackay's "Memoirs of Extraordinary Popular Delusions;" "A Woman's Journey Round the World," translated from the German of Madame Pfeiffer; the "Ottoman Empire under Abdul Medjid," by D. Urquhart; and a new work on the recent discoveries in Nineveh, by Joseph Bonomi.

A TRIP TO THE UNITED STATES and CANADA. By E. W. WATKIN. Smith and Co. 1852.

The author of this little brochure states very frankly, that, having his autumn's vacation before him, he chose rather to spend it on a trip to America than in steaming up the Rhine, or dilgencing it through France; his object being to gain some personal knowledge of the great New World, where so many of his fellow-countrymen are now every day emigrating for life, and the immense resources of which foreshadow a stupendous problem for the future. Accordingly, he starts on the 26th August, 1851, for New York, and sets off on his return again on the 27th September; having employed the month in visiting New York, Niagara, Toronto, Quebec, Montreal, Lakes Niagara Falls, Michigan, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, &c., making copious notes, but of much, about men as about things, and recording his observations in a very pleasant and intelligent manner. It is a relief, after so many professional tourists have nauseated us with paltry criticisms upon men and manners, costume and cookery, to find a man who watches a right importance to the essentials of national happiness and power; leaving nature to fashion and polish her own work, and to smooth down, which she will do in course of time, many features of that rough outside which is one the germ of future civilization and happiness for untold millions. The data about the United States change and grow every day; they should be kept in view every day. Let us, therefore, abstract a few from the pages of the little pocket volume before us.

Seventy years ago, on the foundation of the Republic, it consisted of thirteen small states. It now comprises twenty-nine states, without reckoning the new dominions of Oregon, California, New Mexico, and Texas; and the area in 1850 was 3,202,689 square miles, or 2,081,717,760 acres, nearly thirty times the size of Great Britain and Ireland. Its population in 1790 was less than 4,000,000; in 1850 it was 23,191,876; and it is now 25,000,000. And if its vast territory, with a more productive soil, and greater resources of all kinds, should some day become as thickly peopled as our own island, it will then contain a population of 800,000,000 of human beings speaking the English tongue. The receipts of the States in the general staples of manufacture, mineral and vegetable, are enormous, inexhaustible within any calculable period. With all these national treasures to look forward to, the State burthens have not increased. In 1791 the debt of the United States was £17,000,000; in 1850 it was £21,000,000; it is now, with six times the population, only £4,000,000, and in the same period the imports of the country have increased from a value of £2,000,000 of dollars, to £47,000,000; the exports from £1,000,000 to £40,000,000; and the tonnage of shipping from 500,000 tons to 3,500,000. Finally, the school funds belonging to the respective states, swelled by the constant addition of every sixteenth section of government land sold, are very large. Those belonging to seventeen free states amounted in 1851 to fixed value, to 21,400,000 dollars. Popular education is the condition upon which all new states are admitted into the Union. There are 121 colleges in the States, with a total of 950 instructors, 20,119 alumni, 69938 masters, and 11,565 students, and having 736,979 volumes in their libraries.

This wonderful diffusion of knowledge—of the knowledge of "facts," not of "theories"—by means of the press, aided by the electric telegraph, over the whole vast tract of the States, is so important an element in the condition of society therein, and of its hopes of progress, that any information upon the subject is interesting to us, particularly at a moment when over nearly the whole face of the Old World has prevailing voice of comfort and instruction is silenced by the roar of cannon and the cries of terror and wild passion. Mr. Watkin's observations are very sensible and very much to the point.

There are in America some 2500 separate newspapers published daily, weekly, or at other periods. The total circulation of these newspapers averages one million copies per day.

Now see the working of this cheap telegraph.

The steamer from England comes in at New York or Boston say at two o'clock, p.m., a quarter by four hours' "leading article" of news, are printed, and circulated in New York by an issue of 30,000 evening papers. And in two hours the same news is transmitted, printed, and in circulation all over the Union where the Times or Herald or Tribune of the day's paper exist. Thus you may be sleeping and musing at some out-of-the way place, in a newly-settled state, having the events of two months ago in your head, when an issue of a New York paper is just taking shape in the printing-machine. This news is, perhaps, an hour, or at most two or three hours, old in New York, while a passage of nine and a half or ten days has brought it from England. * * * It is strange, moreover, to see with what rapidity the leading articles, and that the truth, the daily history of the world and its leaders, is made, and big is becoming, amply, of far more interest than the cloudy speculations and dreary prolixities with which we are fed in the columns of our London and the press of America? Men are now reading for news—desiring to form their own opinions, and requiring, in connexion with the data they search for, and now obtain at first hand, no better speculations than their own.

Leaflets have been started over and over again, but being questioned, far away from those places which seemed to me to be the circles of population and intelligence, on some English or Continental event, of which my letters of three days back contained no mention, and by hearing daily, from the mouths of the numbiest, discussions upon what was passing, which showed, to me an Americanism, that every one was "posted up" to the latest date with all the important news of the world.

We conclude by heartily recommending this "Trip" as very agreeable and instructive reading for the railway, or in the intervals in the business of the day.

THE KEEPSAKE, 1852. Edited by Miss POWER. Bogue.

This "last rose" of the Annuals has in its vase a few new contributions; and the papers by writers of former years are quite up to the mark. Among the new comers are Mr Charles Dickens and Mr. Thomas Carlyle. Mr. Dickens' paper is "To be read at Dusk," the witching time to aid the belief in its two ghost stories, which we need scarcely add are extremely told. Mr. Carlyle's contribution—the "Opera" is an eccentric fragment, with the paternity of his distinguished American friend, Professor Ezechiel Pessencraal, and is a droll—but the simple sentimentality of the volume. Another oddity occurs towards its close, in the "Hallelujah of a Sparrow." Of travelling notes there is a very agreeable sprinkling, in which Mr. Albert Smith's six days and nights, from Rome to Naples by the Pontine Marshes, are amusingly told; they proved to the writer—a bore beyond all endurance. The nouvelettes by the lady contributors are full of grave and gay incident; and Mrs. Newton Crosland, besides supplying one of these amenities, presents us with a piquant critique upon Sheridan's "School for Scandal." Barry Cornwall, Lord John Manners, and Mr. Monckton Milnes rank foremost of the poet contributors. Thus, the literature of this year's "keepsake" is more sparkling than many of its predecessors. The illustrations, nearly portrait subjects, fully maintain the artistic character of the work.

The PATHWAY of the FAWN; a Tale for the New Year. By Mr. E. L. HERVEY. 1852.

This is a new production of the romantic school—a most acceptable present for the New Year. The story is German embracing German legend, German sentiment, and the German spirit for art, all artistically combined with an undercurrent of domestic history of extreme interest. The style of composition is exquisitely characteristic; full of delicate sentiment and touching moral. We will not, however, anticipate the pleasure of the reader by revealing any of the incidents. The engravings, twelve in number, from designs by G. Thomas, are of a high class of art, evincing rare poetic sentiment, and vigorous in style. Arrayed in its elegant binding, this is one of the most graceful productions which we have received for many a New Year.

MR. WRAY'S CASH BOX: or, the MASK and the MYSTERY. A Christmas Sketch. By W. WILKIE COLLINS. 1852.

This is an ingenious and prettily-written story of domestic interest, founded upon an incident of the taking of a mask from Shakspeare's bust at Stratford-upon-Avon, which is thus related in the preface:

A stonemason at Stratford-upon-Avon was employed, a few years ago, to make repairs in the church. While thus engaged, he managed—as he thought, unsuspected—to take a mould from the Shakspeare bust. What he had done was found out, however; and he was certainly, by local law, rendered liable to having care of the bust, with the severest pains and penalties of the law—though for what especial offence was not specified. The poor man was so frightened at the consequences, that he packed up his tools at once, and, taking the mould with him, left Stratford. Having afterwards stated his case to persons competent to advise him, he was told that he need fear no penalty whatever, and that, if he thought he could dispose of them, he might make as many casts as he pleased and offer them for sale anywhere. He took the advice, placed his masks neatly on slabs of black marble, and sold great numbers of them, not only in England but in America.

The characters of Mr. Wray, a teacher of elocution upon the mode of John Philip Kemble, and his granddaughter Annie, are drawn with considerable graphic power and a tenderness of sentiment which will introduce them favourably to a large class of readers.

THE IMPERIAL FAMILY OF FRANCE; ITS PAST AND PRESENT MEMBERS.

Cæsar, thou art mighty yet—
Thy spirit walks abroad.

NAPOLEON, like Julius Cæsar, implanted himself and his generation immoveably on the mind of his nation. The dagger of Brutus, the temporary restoration of former freedom, the brilliant regal transactions of Marc Antony, profited nothing, and resulted only in disappointment and defeat—in Philippi and Actium. The Roman people thought but of him whose five hundred battles had made them the mightiest of the earth. They would have none but Cæsar; and they willingly submitted to another of his race, who consolidated, amid prescription and slaughter, an empire boundless in sway, and nearly so in time, the traces of the influence of which even still endure. The same holds true of Napoleon. His death at St Helena, the chain of events which led from legitimate Royalty to limited Monarchy, and from that to the widest freedom, have in his case availed not either. Whenever the people's voice cries, the shout is for Napoleon. They will have his ashes back to repose among those whom he loved so well; they will have his nephew to inaugurate their new republic. And now, like the fourth-rate god, they will yield up all power only to him who, with cunning and brutal severity, prepares to perpetuate the Napoleon dynasty—who already sets as Octavius, and in whom they fondly—too fondly perhaps—view a future Augustus. Similar to the Cæsar dynasty of Rome, the Imperial family of France promises to occupy men's minds for many ages to come. "On parlera de sa gloire" they will speak of his glory," augured Berenger of Bonaparte during the Bourbon Restoration; "and," continued he, "in fifty years hence they will give ear to no other story"—dans cinquante ans ne connaîtra-t-on d'autre histoire." The prophecy is proved before its time. Little more than half the period foretold has elapsed, and France is absorbed in the Imperial theme. As such a moment an exact knowledge of the actual status and condition of the present Napoleon generation becomes of momentous interest to all. Most readers, therefore—and they must have information and recollections on the subject, yet whose memory may be helped by these details—will not, we presume, be sorry to receive the following particulars about the dead but not departed modern Cæsar, and about his widely-extended kindred.

Napoleon's proud assertion that he was "the Rodolph of his race," and that his patent of nobility dated from the battle of Monte Notte, must not stand literally as evidence of the humble origin of the Bonaparte family, but rather of the haughty mind of the Imperial ruler, which could ill brook the idea of inferiority, even in this respect, to other potentates, though Hapsburg and Bourbon were amongst them.

From a remote period were distinguished in Italy the Bonapartes—or rather Buonapartes, for so the name was originally spelt, and so was it perversely continued with the n by the enemies of Napoleon, for the purpose of recalling his foreign origin and his birth away from the land of France. As far back as the twelfth century we find the name of John Buonaparte enrolled in the list of the gallant Knights of St. James of Calatrava. This celebrated order admitted within its community those only who were of noble birth, and thus we have proof that the Bonaparte family held at that distant epoch no inconsiderable position in the world. The cradle of the race seems to have been at Treviso, whence the descendan s passed into, and obtained note in, various countries of Italy. In 1512, Gabriel Buonaparte, of the Sarzana division of the family, went to Corsica, and, fixing his residence at Ajaccio, founded the branch whence sprang Napoleon. From this Gabriel Buonaparte descended Charles, the father of Napoleon, who was the first who dropped the u in the name.

CHARLES BONAPARTE was born the 29th of March, 1746. Having studied law at Pisa, and attained eminence as an advocate, he changed the gown for the sword, to assist in the gallant and patriotic struggle made against the French for the independence of his country. At the decisive moment of the conflict, he would have drawn his pistol upon his uncle Paoli, but was dissuaded from the step by his wealthy uncle, the Archdeacon of Ajaccio; and he became in the sequel reconciled to the conquering party, and was protected by the French Governor of Corsica. It was in the midst of these scenes of conflict and skirmishes that Charles Bonaparte, who is described as possessed of handsome person and great vivacity of intellect, married MARIA LETITIA DE RAMOLINO, one of the most beautiful women of Corsica, and a lady of incomparable firmness of mind. During the years of danger she partook the dangers of her husband, and used to accompany him through all the toils and dangers of the mountain warfare. Charles Bonaparte, who, on the establishment of French supremacy, became a member of the tribunal in Corsica, a representative of the nation, and one of the Assembly of Notables, died at the French Court, died at Montpellier, the 24th Feb., 1785, in his forty-first year. His lovely and high-spirited wife, afterwards so well known as MADAME MERE, lived long after him, witnessed all the glory and misfortunes of her mighty son, survived him also, and died in her native island, aged 83. Her mother, it should be remarked, had first been married to her husband a Swiss officer in the French service, named Fesch, and had by him a son, GIUSEPPO, afterwards his Eminence CARDINAL FESCH, who was thus half-brother of Letitia Bonaparte. The issue of CHARLES and LETITIA BONAPARTE were thirteen children; of these, five died in infancy. The others and their progeny we shall now set forth; averting, however, the regular order, so far as to begin with the second and the greatest son, NAPOLEON, and to follow, for reasons we shall mention, with his nephew, the present President of the French Republic.

NAPOLEON BONAPARTE, EMPEROR OF THE FRENCH, KING OF ITALY, AND PROTECTOR OF THE CONFEDERATION OF THE RHINE, was the second son of Charles and Letitia Bonaparte; he was born in Ajaccio the 15th August, 1769, He became First Consul the 9th Nov., 1799, and Emperor the 18th May, 1804. His first forced abdication was on the 11th April, 1814; his second, after the battle of Waterloo, on the 22d June, 1815. He died a prisoner at St. Helena, the 5th May, 1821. Such is the frame of dates which embraces a career that stands unrivalled in the modern history of the world. Napoleon married, first, on the 8th March, 1796, MARIA ROSE JOSEPHINE TASCHER DE LA PAGERIE, Viscountess Dowager de Beauharnais (see below, FAMILY OF JOSEPHINE), a remarkable woman, who seemed to be the good genius of Napoleon's prosperity, and who died of grief when his ruin came. After the unkind and unwise divorce from Josephine, Napoleon married, secondly, the 2d April, 1810, the ARCHDUCHESS MARIA LOUISA, daughter of Francis II., Emperor of AUSTRIA. By the Empress Josephine, who died at Malmaison, the 29th May, 1814, Napoleon had no issue. By the Empress Maria Louisa, who died Duchess of Parma, the 17th December, 1847, the Emperor left an only son, NAPOLEON, KING OF ROME, born at Paris, the 20th March, 1811, the child of many hopes, who terminated a short and melancholy life, as DUKE OF REICHSTADT, the 22d July, 1832. On the extinction of the issue of the Emperor Napoleon, his elder brother Joseph became the representative. Joseph is now dead, leaving a daughter only; consequently the male representation would properly devolve on the next brother LUCIEN, and his descendants; but it is maintained that Lucien was not admitted to the position of a French prince until 1815, long after his younger brother, LOUIS, and that Lucien, as well as the youngest, JEROME, having married without the Imperial consent, was excluded from the succession by the law of 1804. Upon these grounds, it is further insisted, that, according to the order of precedence established by the Constitution of the Empire, the male representation of the family of Bonaparte now belongs to the youngest and sole surviving son of Louis Bonaparte, by his wife, Hortense de Beauharnais, who is

NAPOLEON LOUIS CHARLES BONAPARTE, the present PRESIDENT of the FRENCH REPUBLIC. This extraordinary man, who presides, with bloodstained and despotic authority, over the destinies of France, was born at Paris the 20th April, 1808. A reported remark of his mother Hortense, during his early youth, seems verified by the events of his life: "That child," said she, "is a mere compound of obstinacy and daring." His career has, up to this time, been one of imminent danger and wonderful success. His attempt at Strassoorg, his invasion of Boulogne, accompanied by a new imitation of the eagle, and his escape from Ham, were but prelude to his appearance in France in 1848, when his election as deputy in the National Assembly for the department of Yonne, the 26th September of that year, began the new fortunes of himself and his House.

By a decree of the National Assembly on the 11th Oct., 1848, the laws which had exiled the Bonapartes from France were abrogated, and on the 16th and 17th of the following December Napoleon Louis was chosen President of the Republic by more than six millions of votes. What he has just done, and what he is next to do belong, as yet to no other report than public alarm and public discussion. The President of the Republic is unmarried.

With this digression, we now return to the regular descent of the Bonaparte family. The whole surviving issue of Charles and Letitia Bonaparte were five sons and three daughters, who in their proper order, genealogically, rank as follows:

I. JOSEPH NAPOLEON BONAPARTE, born on the 7th January, 1768, Prince Imperial and Grand Elector of France; King of Naples and Sicily, the 30th March, 1806; King of Spain and the Indies from the 6th June, 1808, to 1814. On the second abdication of Napoleon, Joseph purchased considerable estates in North America, and retired thither with the title of Count Survilliers. He has married, the 1st August, 1794, MARIA JULIA CLARY, elder sister of the present Queen Dowager of Sweden, the widow of King Charles John Bernadotte. By Maria Julia Clary (who died the 7th of April, 1845), Joseph had two daughters: one, CHARLOTTE, widow of her cousin Napoleon, the Prince Imperial; and a brother, died in 1839; the other, the elder, ZENAIDA, is the wife of her cousin Charles, Prince of Canino. Joseph Bonaparte died the 28th July, 1844

II. NAPOLEON, EMPEROR OF THE FRENCH, of whom, see above.

III. LUCIEN BONAPARTE, born at AJACCIO in 1775, successively President of the Council of Five Hundred, Minister of the Interior under the Consular Government, and Ambassador to Madrid in 1801. In 1804, the year of Napoleon's assumption of the Imperial diadem, he retired to Italy, and, establishing his residence in the Eternal City, purchased an estate within the Territories of the Church, at Canino, near Viterbo. This the Pope raised into a principality, inscribing at the same time the name of "the Prince of Canino" among the Roman nobility. In 1810, distrustful of the security of his asylum in Italy, Lucien embarked for the United States, but was captured by two English frigates and conveyed to Malta, to await the orders of our Government.

In conformity with those instructions he was transferred to England, where he arrived the 18th December, and fixed himself in Shropshire, about fifteen miles from Ludlow, on a beautiful estate which he had chosen for purchase. Here he sojourned, devoted to literature and the repose of domestic life, until the peace of 1814 opened his way to the Continent, and enabled him to return to his old friend and protector, Pius VII. During the hundred days he played a prominent part in the Council of State in France the portfolio of the Interior. After the conflict at Waterloo he urged the Emperor to make one great effort in defence of his throne; but the mighty mind of Napoleon was then either at fault, or the man himself betrayed. He feigned not to his brother counsel, and Lucien with difficulty effected his escape to Rome. There the Prince of Canino passed the remainder of his days, much respected in private life, and there he died on the 30th June, 1840.

Lucien was, after Napoleon, the ablest and most ambitious of the Bonapartes: and at one time his literary and scientific attainments received the most preposterous laudation from the French savans. His "Charlemagne" made its first appearance in London in 1814, but the success it met with was very indifferent. Besides this heavy epic the Prince of Canino published "Various other works"—"Stechina," a novel; and the "Cyrneide; or, Corsica Saved."

By his first marriage, in 1794, with CHRISTINA BOYER (who died in 1801), Lucien Bonaparte left issue two daughters: the elder, CHARLOTTE, born the 18th of May, 1796, is widow of the Roman Prince Gabrielli, by whom she has a son and three daughters. The younger daughter of Lucien by this marriage, Christiana Egypta, was married in 1826 to Lord Dudley Coutts Stuart, eighth son of the first Marquis of Bute, and died at Rome the 15th of May, 1847, leaving an only son. Lucien married, secondly, in 1802, ALEXANDRINA LAURENTIA DE BLESCHAMP, by whom (who survives him, and is now Princess Lucien of Canino) he left issue—CHARLES LUCIEN, PRINCE OF CANINO AND MUSIGNANO, born at Paris the 24th May, 1803, member of the principal scientific academies of Europe and America, married, the 29th June, 1822, to his cousin ZENAIDA, only surviving child of his late uncle Joseph, by whom he has three sons, Joseph, Lucien, and Napoleon, and five daughters, Julia, married to Alexander de Colloredo Mansfeld, Duke of Rovigno; Charlotte, married to Count Peter Primoli; Maria, married to Paul, Count of Campello; Augusta; and Bathilda. LOUIS, born the 4th of January, 1813. PETER NAPOLEON, born the 12th of September, 1815. ANTONY, born the 21st of October, 1816. LETITIA, born the 1st December, 1804, married, in 1821, to Lucien Murat, Prince Murat, Marquis of Bassano, Grand Master of the Ceremonies to Queen Maria Christina, Knight of the Golden Fleece, Minister Plenipotentiary, Extraordinary, and Minister Plenipotentiary at Athens, Grand Cross of the Order of the Redeemer of Greece, by whom she has issue two sons, Alfred and William, and MARIA, born the 11th October, 1813, married to CHARLES LUCIEN, Viscount of CAMPI-CONSTANTIA, born the 10th January, 1803, Chamberlain of the Sacred Court, at Rome.

IV. LOUIS BONAPARTE, born at Ajaccio, the 21 September, 1778, successively Constable and Arch-Chancellor of France, in 1804; King of Holland, in 1806, which dignity he resigned to become mere viceroy to the Imperial brother, he abdicated in 1810. Louis, with the title of Duke, and Count of St. Leu, retired from public life, and after 1815 went to reside in the Tuscan States. The whole life of Louis Bonaparte, the most unhappy of his family, was embittered by his unhappy marriage with the famous HORTENSE DE BEAUHARNAIS, the daughter (see below, FAMILY OF JOSEPHINE), which took place the 3d Jan., 1802. He and his beautiful wife could never agree; quarrels and separation ensued; yet it would appear the fault was mainly on the side of Hortense, who was an ambitious politician, and lived but in public excitement and state intrigue. Hortense, however, had great attractions and great talents; her taste and skill in poetry and music were well known; her beautiful romance of "Partant pour la Syrie" is popular still. Louis died the 25th July, 1846. By his consort Hortense (whose death occurred the 5th October, 1837) Louis had three sons: the eldest, NAPOLEON, a child in 1807; the second, NAPOLEON LOUIS, Prince Royal of Holland, born the 11th October, 1804, married his cousin CHARLOTTE (daughter of Joseph, died in 1839), second daughter of his uncle Joseph, and died suddenly the 17th March, 1831 the fatigues of the Bolognese expedition, in which he was engaged, having caused his death. The third and only surviving child of Louis and Hortense is NAPOLEON LOUIS CHARLES, THE PRESIDENT OF THE FRENCH REPUBLIC. (See above.

V. JEROME BONAPARTE, born at Ajaccio, the 15th Nov., 1784. King of Westphalia from the 1st Dec., 1807, to the 26th October, 1813. He was at the head of the army of that country in the invasion of Russia. In 1814, however, the Allies deprived him of his throne. At Waterloo he commanded the left wing of the French army, and, on the defeat of the Emperor, retreated with the débris of the forces to Paris. He subsequently proceeded to Wirtemburg, and was created a Prince of that kingdom by the title of Duke de Montfort. His first wife (by whom he married in America, in 1803, and from whom he separated in 1805) was ELIZABETH PATTERSON, of Baltimore, a lady of Irish extraction, sister of Robert Patterson, Esq., the first husband of the late Marchioness Wellesley. By her he had one child, Jerome, born 6th July, 1805, at Baltimore, where he now resides, and was married, the 9th May, 1829, to Miss Susanna Gay. The second wife of Jerome Bonaparte was FREDERICA CATHERINE SOPHIA, daughter of Frederick, King of Wirtemburg, and by her (who died the 28th Nov., 1835) he has had two sons and a daughter: JEROME, Prince of Montfort, Colonel in the service of Wirtemburg, born at Trieste, 24th August, 1814, and died in May, 1847; NAPOLEON, PRINCE OF MONTFORT, born at Trieste, 9th Sept., 1822; and MATHILDA LETITIA, born also at Trieste, 27th May, 1820, and married, in 1841, to Prince Anatol Demidoff.

Jerome Bonaparte, the only survivor of the Imperial brothers and sisters who has lived to return from exile, is now Governor of the Invalides at Paris, and a Marshal of France, having received his baton on the 1st Jan., 1850.

VI. ELIZA BONAPARTE, born the 3rd January, 1777, married, the 5th May, 1797, to FELIX BACCHIOCHI. Her husband and herself were made, by her Imperial brother, Prince and Princess of Lucca and Piombino in 1805, and Sovereign Grand Duke and Duchess of Tuscany in 1809. After the occupation of that territory by the allies, Eliza and her consort retired to Bohemia, and finally to Trieste. She died in August, 1820; her husband survived her until the 27th April, 1841. They had two children, FREDERICK, who died at Rome, and NAPOLEONA ELIZA, born 3rd June, 1806, who is married to the Count Camerata

VII. PAULINE BONAPARTE, born the 20th Oct., 1780, a woman of surpassing beauty, and the favourite and devotedly attached sister of Napoleon. She was created Princess and Duchess of Guastalla, the 31st March, 1806; but on the 24th May following the Duchy was reunited to the Kingdom of Italy, and the titles were paid to the Princess as compensation. PAULINE was married, first, in 1801, to General LECLERC, who died the following year at St. Domingo. She wedded, secondly, the 28th Aug., 1803, CAMILLO, Prince de Borghese; she had no issue by either marriage. The Princess PAULINE died at the Borghese Palace, near Florence, the 9th June, 1825; her husband, Prince CAMILLO, died on the 9th May, 1832. The Princess PAULINE, who never deserted NAPOLEON, is said to have been not a little instrumental in effecting his return from Elba, and his restoration to the Imperial throne. A story is told of her, that she was the model of the Venus of Canova.

VIII. CAROLINE BONAPARTE, born the 26th March, 1782, married, the 20th January, 1800, to that gallant and chivalrous soldier of the Republic and the Empire, Le beau Sabreur, as Napoleon termed him, JOACHIM MURAT, born the 2d March, 1771, Prince and Grand Admiral and Marshal of France, Grand Duke of Cleves and Berg, and, in 1808, KING OF NAPLES: he was shot to death the 13th October, 1815. Since her husband's demise, the Princess Caroline lived in Austria, under the title of Countess of Lipona. She died on the 18th May, 1839.

Beyond consanguinean, superficial ties to all her relatives, with the exception of Napoleon and Lucien, Caroline Bonaparte could not fail to win the esteem of the former, yet he dreaded her ambition, which according to his account, was unbounded. As Queen of Naples she made herself loved on all hands to have shown great ability, and winning engaging condescension in securing the comfort of the people, and in establishing useful institutions: above all, she had a firmness of purpose which contrasted favourably with the vacillation of her husband. When, after the flight of Murat, Naples was exposed to all the horrors of anarchy, she adopted measures equally prompt, wise, and energetic for preserving the public tranquillity. She assembled the national guard, which she placed at different points to oversee the licentious populace; and by this means some hundreds of the rioters were cut down in the act. She watched over every thing; nor would she leave Naples until she had concluded an honourable treaty with Commodore Campbell, and until the Austrians were on the point of entering it. When Joachim and the Emperor Francis, she then proceeded to her brother's residence at Rome, where she afterwards remained, and where she died.

Of the mental superiority of the ex-Queen, no less a person than Talleyrand has recorded his testimony. She was, Talleyrand says, on one occasion, "a pretty woman."

The children of the late King Joachim and Caroline Bonaparte are two sons and two daughters: the sons are, NAPOLEON ACHILLE MURAT, born the 21st Jan., 1801, married to a grand-niece of General Moreau, which lady died the 15th April, 1847; and CHARLES LUCIEN MURAT, born the 16th May, 1803, lately Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary from France at the Court of Turin. The daughters of Joachim and Caroline are LETITIA JOSEPHA, born the 28th April, 1802, married to Count Popoli, and LOUISA JULIA CAROLINA, born the 22nd March, 1805, married, at Ravenna, to Count Rasponi.

EUGENE ROSE DE BEAUHARNAIS, the son of Josephine, and the adopted son of Napoleon, was born in 1780. He was one of the great captains of the Emperor, and became Viceroy of Italy, Prince of Venice, and Hereditary Grand Duke of Frankfort. These honours ceased with the fortune of Napoleon; but by his marriage, the 13th January, 1806, with Augusta (who died the 13th May, 1851), the daughter of Maximilian, King of Bavaria, Eugene preserved a high position among the princes of Europe: he was made Duke of Leuchtenberg and Prince of Eichstadt, with large territorial possessions, and the title of General Highness for himself and his descendants. Prince Eugene died at Munich, the 24th Sept., 1824, and left issue two sons and three daughters AUGUSTUS, the eldest son, his successor, married, the 2nd January, 1835, DONA MARIA Queen of Portugal, and died two months afterwards. MAXIMILIAN, the second son, is the present Duke of Leuchtenberg and Prince of Eichstadt. He was married, the 14th July, 1839, to MARIA, eldest daughter of the present Emperor of Russia, and has two sons and three daughters. The daughters of the late Prince Eugene are JOSEPHINE, present Queen of Sweden; AMELIA, widow of Don Pedro, and Empress Dowager of Brazil; and LOUISA, consort of COUNT WILLIAM OF WIRTEMBURG.

HORTENSE DE BEAUHARNAIS, the daughter of the Empress Josephine, was born the 10th of April, 1783, and married, the 3rd of January, 1802, to Louis Bonaparte, and Queen of Holland, and died Duchess of St. Leu, the mother of the present President of the French Republic. (See above

THE ENGINEERS AND THEIR EMPLOYERS.

ONE of the most serious disputes that has ever occurred between a body of influential employers and a vast number of skilled and unskilled operatives rages at this moment. The quarrel threatens, unless speedily brought to a termination, to inflict the most deadly injury upon the trade of the country, and upon the future condition of the labouring men who are parties to it. These men not only rank among the most numerous but among the most intelligent and important of the working classes. The very name of British industry suggests to foreign nations the particular business in which they are engaged, and, more than any other branch of our multifarious manufactures, it calls to mind the real sources of the wealth and power of Great Britain. We have invented, we have manufactured, and we have perfected machinery for the whole civilised world. We have assumed and we have maintained a leading position as the fabricators of the highest, most complicated, and most powerful descriptions of machinery; and, if other nations have taken lessons from us, and have imitated our example, they as yet follow in our wake at a long and respectful distance. This position we owe not alone to the pith and sinew of our working men, valuable as these are, but to the philosophic mind of the nation, the far-seeing enterprise and indomitable energy of the great employers of labour, and the all but inexhaustible resources of British capital. That these high advantages and this pre-eminence should be imperilled by a dispute between employers and employed, is deplorable; but that they should be lost, would be disastrous, if not fatal, to many other great interests besides those more immediately implicated.

Many disputes have, in former times, taken place between capital and labour, from an erroneous notion prevalent among working men, that capital is their foe and not their friend, and that the great and only fund out of which it is possible that labour should be paid is a fund which the labourer should detest, or, at all events, be especially jealous of. Every dispute of the kind has ultimately turned to the disadvantage of the working classes, to the diminution of their wages by the introduction of competitors, in the shape either of improved machinery or or

THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM-PACKET COMPANY'S SHIP "AMAZON," BURST ON SUNDAY LAST, ON HER FIRST OUTWARD VOYAGE TO THE WEST INDIES.

IN the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS for July 5, 1851, appeared an Illustration of the Launch of the steamer Amazon, at Blackwall, on Saturday, June 28. The vessel is there described as "the largest timber-built steam-ship ever constructed in England," and as one of a fleet of new vessels about to be placed by the Royal Mail Steam-packet Company on the West India service; the steamers at present employed on that station being found not sufficiently powerful to maintain that degree of speed and regularity which is required by the increased demand for more rapid communication with our West Indian colonies. The whole period occupied in her construction (continues the account) has been little more than nine months; and in about a year from the time that her keel was laid down this noble vessel will have been fully completed, and ready to proceed on her first voyage. The launch was an interesting scene: the shipwrights' hammers struck away the supports—the naming was duly performed—and the majestic vessel glided gracefully into the water.

The Amazon, of 3000 tons burthen, was built by Messrs. J. and H. Green, of Blackwall; with engines of 800-horse power, by Messrs. Seaward and Capel, of Millwall, Poplar. On her first trial trip from Blackwall, she was started with such ease that her departure was not perceptible to those between decks at the time; and as she proceeded down the river her powerful engines worked with great perfection, and were the admiration of all on board. The diameter of the cylinders was 96 inches each, and the stroke 9 feet, and the engines made 14 revolutions of the large paddle-wheels (40 feet 8 inches in diameter) per minute, and a speed by the log of 11 knots per hour. The Amazon drew 19 feet forward and 19 feet 9 in. aft, which rendered it difficult to navigate her over Barking Bar, and she was brought to anchor below Gravesend for the night. On Dec. 18 she arrived from the Thames in the Southampton tidal dock, and was declared the finest ship that had ever appeared in those waters, which was proved by her subsequent performances.

The [illegible] was surveyed, and considered capable of carrying fourteen [illegible] guns, and two 10-inch pivot guns of 86 cwt. each, on her main-deck: her coal-boxes were constructed to carry 1000 tons of coal, or upwards of 16½ days' consumption, at the rate of 2½ tons per hour for her 26 furnaces. She was fitted up with Captain Sir Snow Harris's lightning-conductors, and in case of need could accommodate 360 troops below, allowing each man 12 superficial feet: her engines were fitted in a framework independent of the vessel, and no perceptible vibration was felt when standing on deck over them. The length of the vessel was 310 feet, with a breadth of beam of 42 feet, and 72 feet over the paddle-boxes. The interior was fitted in a very elegant style, and the cost of the vessel is stated at upwards of £100,000.

On Friday afternoon last, the 2d inst., the Amazon, Captain Symons, took her departure from Southampton, with the usual mails for the British and foreign West Indies (except Havannah and Honduras), the Gulf of Mexico, Spanish Main, &c., in charge of Lieutenant Brady, R.N., Admiralty agent. She took out fifty passengers, a large and valuable cargo, specie value £20,000 sterling, and 800 bottles of quicksilver, value £3150 sterling, for mining operations in Mexico. The value women and children, and to the permanent deterioration of their condition. With the hope that such a consummation may be avoided in the present case, and that the most important trade of the country may not be forced to seek a habitation elsewhere by a course of proceeding alike injurious to the welfare of the men who make, and to that of the masters who rest them, we would earnestly draw the attention of the most intelligent of the operatives to the real state of the dispute, and to the attempted injustice which lies at the bottom of it.

The demands of the operative engineers, as put forth on the authority of a body calling itself the Amalgamated Society of Engineers, are or were three; we say were, because the last of the three has been disavowed; but whether on authority or not will appear hereafter.

The first demand is for the cessation of overtime, except in cases of inevitable accident or break-down. That any body of working men should insist upon the exercise of such tyranny, appears too monstrous. If a despotic master should force a man to work beyond his strength, on the penalty of dismissal from his employment, he would most undoubtedly be guilty of a cruel and unjustifiable act. But happily the despotism would be as impolitic as it is unnecessary. There are always men who are waiting to work overtime for extra pay; men who prefer the honest earnings of an additional hour's labour to the squandering of that hour in the gin-palace, the beer-shop, or the skittle-ground, and who ask no greater boon than remunerative employment. If no tyranny be exercised by the working men themselves in preventing such labour, employers will never be at a loss to procure willing and grateful hands for all the extra work they may require. It is well known that in this particular business, as in many others, a sudden demand will arise, which must be met, or the market will be lost. If the employer be prevented by the employed from taking advantage of these chances and prizes of his business, the opportunity of trade is thrown away. We would put it to the working men themselves to answer the question—who suffers most by a stagnation of trade, the employer or the employed? In all trades there are unfortunately a number of idle and dissolute men who dislike work—men who, if they can earn sufficient in three or four days to keep them for six, will only work three or four days, and pass the remainder in drinking and dissipation. When the revolution of 1848 occurred, there was so great a demand for guns for the Continent that the manufacturers of Birmingham were unable to execute them with sufficient promptitude. Every available hand was employed, and wages in a short time doubled themselves. And what was the consequence? To use the language of an operative, as we find it recorded in one of the letters on "Labour and the Poor" published in the Morning Chronicle in the course of last year, "the gun-stockers grew saucy and would not work at hard stocks, which required extra labour. They would pick and choose. Sometimes, after gaining £3 or £4 in one week, they would 'play' the week after; and very often they would not work above three days in the week." The result was that many of the Birmingham manufacturers were unable to execute their orders; that the gun-manufacturers of Belgium and France, where the workman had no such habits, and were too grateful for extra work and extra wages to think of being "saucy," got the business which Birmingham lost; and the same man who could easily have earned 28. 6d. or 3s. for stocking a gun, saw the price reduced by the operation of the natural and inevitable laws of trade to 1s., and was only too happy to accept that price to save himself from beggary or the workhouse. We hold, therefore, and we think all sensible and sober working men will agree with us, that as employers are to their own sakes will not work overtime, except in cases of absolute necessity, it is suicidal conduct on the part of working men to refuse their assistance, and most arbitrary and unjust both towards the employers and to those fellow-labourers who may be willing to work. The only effect of such a demand, if agreed to, would be to jeopardise the whole trade, and drive it to other countries.

The second claim is for the abolition of piece-work. This demand will, no doubt, be supported by the idle and the incompetent workman, for its effect would be to place him on the same level with the industrious and the skilful; to give him a reward, to which he is not entitled, at the expense of the superior merit of his fellows; to bring about the ruin of his employer, and, consequently, the diminution or extinction of the latter fund. That a body so intelligent as the operative engineers should raise such a demand, is almost incredible; but as it is clearly proved that they have made it, and insist upon it, the only inference which can be drawn is, that they are misguided by busy and knavish members of their own class, who are pleased with the importance which agitation gives to them, and who would rather spout and talk, and get up meetings, than do their fair work like honest men.

The third demand, as originally made, was, that the employers should discharge from their works all persons who were not members of the trades' union known by the name of the Amalgamated Society. This was too daring and too wicked to be openly persisted in; and it appears that some of the leaders of the agitation have disowned all connexion with it. If the masters could accede to such a proposition, and obey such a behest, they would seal the ruin of the trade and that of all the persons they employ. They might, perhaps, avoid their own ruin by the invention and perfection of machines to diminish human labour, or by the employment of women; but in this case the result to the men would be the same. The fate of the unfortunate journeymen tailors of London and Liverpool would be theirs; and engineers, instead of ranking among the best paid of working men, as they now do, would descend to the low level of a bare subsistence, and it would require the labour of a whole family to procure the food and clothing now earned by the unaided labour of one man. But it is unnecessary, perhaps, to dwell upon this point, as the disavowal of a few shows that at least one portion of the engineers are ashamed of, and abandon, it.

The formidable and extensive organisation of the employed in raising these demands has led to an equally formidable organisation of the employers in resisting them; and it has been announced, that, on this day (the 10th instant), unless a satisfactory arrangement shall have been previously made, all the engineering work of England shall simultaneously cease. The Amalgamated Society is said to have accumulated a very large fund; but, I hope as it is, it would not amount to a fortnight's, if even to a week's, wages of the men who will be thrown out of work by the determination of the masters. Let the working men consider well what they are about. Let them not be misled by pretended friends who are their real foes. Let them study the laws of trade—which neither employers nor employed can control, much more set aside—and let them read the industrial history of their country. They will there find that no turnout or strike was ever of advantage to the working classes, but the very reverse, and that the warfare in which they have embarked against those men, whose interests are identical with their own, can lead to no other result than to loss and misery, to present bitterness of spirit, and to future degradation. It is, perhaps, fortunate that it should be so; for did not such tyranny, when temporarily enforced, carry the seeds of its own speedy discomfiture along with it, England would long ago have ceased to be a manufacturing country, and instead of being at the head would have been at the tail of civilisation—without trade, without wealth, without influence, and without power. We trust that the engineers will learn a truth before they have gone too far, and that this unhappy dispute may yet be arranged without mischief or prejudice to either party.

TOTAL DESTRUCTION OF THE "AMAZON" BY FIRE.—GREAT LOSS OF LIFE.

of the specie, quicksilver, cargo, &c., when added to the value of the ship, gives a total amount of property of little less than £200,000 sterling.

The departure of this noble ship on her first voyage had been scarcely announced when the public mind was startled and horrorstricken with the fearful news—at first scarcely believed—of the total destruction by fire of this majestic "castle of the deep," and the loss of 115 out of the 161 souls who had left Southampton on board her, but a few hours before, full of life and hope, and with the cheerful expectation of accomplishing one of the quickest voyages to be recorded in the steam navigation of the Atlantic. It was anticipated, indeed, that she would make a run out to St Thomas's of under fourteen days, The distance from Southampton to St. Thomas's is 3622 miles. She was the first of the new direct line of steam-ships intended to run fortnightly between Southampton and Chagres, touching at St. Thomas's; with several lines of branch packets, for the accommodation of the West India Islands, the Gulf of Mexico &c., were to run from the island of St. Thomas to the various ports and islands embraced in the new scheme of the West India Mail-packet Company, and sanctioned by the Lords of the Admiralty. By means of the main trunk line, the course of which is a perfectly straight route from Southampton to Chagres, a great steam ferry is, in point of fact, established between Europe and the Isthmus of Panama.

From the hurried and imperfect accounts of the catastrophe which have been given by the survivors, we learn the following main facts.

The Amazon, on clearing Southampton Water on Friday evening week, encountered in the Channel strong head winds and rain; and on two different occasions, prior to the discovery of the fire, she was obliged to be stopped in her course, on account of what is technically termed "hot bearings," in other words, the heating to redness of the axles, and other moving parts of the engines, by the excessive friction of the new machinery. The first stoppage was made on Friday night, off Portland Hill, between 8 and 12 o'clock; the second about the same time on Saturday night, for about 2 hours. At a quarter before 1 on Sunday morning, when the ship was about 110 miles west-south-west of Scilly, a fire was discovered by the engineer, Mr. Lewis, on board the after part of the foremost funnel. The alarm-bell was rung, and Captain Symons rushed on deck in his dressing-gown and slippers. Hose and buckets of water were placed on the gratings of the spar deck hatch, and a hose was brought to play on the main-deck, but quickly abandoned in consequence of the excessive heat. The deck-pump was also kept at work until the men were forced to retire. The wind was blowing half a gale from south-west, and the vessel was going 8½ knots, which was her average rate from the time of departure. Captain Symons ordered some hay between the engine-room crank gratings to be thrown overboard; two trusses were hove over the ship's side, but the fire soon ignited the main body, the hatchways on each side, and the paddle-boxes; the men were obliged to abandon the deck, and those who could were all finally driven from the ship. Many were burnt in their berths, others suffocated, and a great number were drowned in the lowering of the boats.

Mr. Vincent, a merchant, who served as one of the quadumpers on board, and who is one of the few survivors, gives the following narrative in a letter addressed to the secretary of the Royal Mail Steam-packet Company, dated Jan. 6, 1852:

"The Amazon was at noon of the 31 of January, 1852, in latitude 49 19 N., and longitude 4 37 W., from which time she steered W. by S. ½ S. till 9 30 p.m. of the same day, when she was stopped to cool the bearings. At 11 20 p.m. she proceeded, still steering the same course, steaming about 8½ knots per hour, wind and sea increasing. At about 1 a.m. on the 1st of January a.m. on the 1st smoke was observed coming through the hatchway on the foreside of the foremost funnel. Immediately afterwards the flames burst through. The alarm was immediately given, and the engineer, Mr. Lewis, was on deck. The fire-hose and buckets of water were brought to play on the fire, but that, together with the attempt to stop the engine, was ineffectual. The helm was put hard to starboard to get her before the wind, but it was found impossible to keep her off. The mail-boat, when lowered, was immediately swamped, with about twenty-five people on her, all of whom were lost. The pinnace, when lowered, shared across her keel, and the vessel was going 8½ knots, which was her average rate from the time of departure. Captain Symons ordered some hay between the engine-room crank gratings to be thrown overboard; two trusses were hove over the ship's side, but the fire soon ignited the main body, the hatchways on each side, and the paddle-boxes; the men were obliged to abandon the deck, and those who could were all finally driven from the ship. GREEN'S LIFE-BOAT.

The above Life-boat, which was of such service in saving the lives of the persons who were fortunate enough to escape from the burning vessel, was one of those furnished to the Amazon by the Messrs. Green, of Blackwall. The following were the dimensions of the boat:—Length, 30 feet; beam, 8 feet; depth, 3 feet. She was built of mahogany, with two skins—the inner one diagonally, and the outer fore and aft. Running entirely round her on the inside, and immediately under the thwarts, was a solid cork casing, extending to the floor of the boat, and sufficiently wide to form a good sitting for persons between the oarsmen, of whom there were twelve, double-banked. The boat was nearly flat-bottomed, and carried a single lugsail.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

The important events of the last few weeks have been succeeded by a pause, of which Louis Napoleon avails himself to efface from the aspect of the Republic every democratic feature which it recently bore, while at the same time, he surrounds himself with imposing state and pomp, so regal in character that he evidently aims at thereby accustoming the public to see in him the object of that homage which is usually reserved for crowned heads alone, and thus gradually and imperceptibly preparing the nation to witness, without surprise, his assuming, when the favourable occasion offers, the purple and diadem of the Empire. He has, for instance, taken up his residence in the ancient palace of the Sovereigns of France, the Tuileries, where he gives banquets of Regal magnificence; he has ordered his effigy to be struck upon the coinage of the nation, surrounded by the words "Louis Napoleon Bonaparte," without any title, whether as President or otherwise, being affixed, so that the blank may be filled up hereafter with the words "Emperor" or "King of the French," without having recourse to any violent transition; he has restored the Imperial eagles to the standards of the army; he has commanded medals commemorative of the events of December to be struck; the official organ, the Moniteur, recommends the restoration of the titles and orders of hereditary nobility; the trees of Liberty are uprooted everywhere; the Republican motto, "Liberty, Equality, Fraternity," is erased from the public edifices; the colossal statue of Liberty, surmounted by a Phrygian cap, which stood in the centre of the Place de Bourgogne, behind the Legislative Assembly, has been demolished; and the old anti-Republican names of the streets are to be restored, so that the Palais National again becomes the Palais Royal; the Théâtre de la Nation, the Théâtre Français; the Rue de la Concorde, the Rue Royale, &c.; and in short, to all appearances, Louis Napoleon is very assiduously paving the way to the throne of the Empire as Napoleon II.

One of the medals to commemorate the events of December has on the obverse a bust of the President, and on the reverse a figure of Roman bearing the number of affirmative votes obtained on December 21, with these words for a legend, "Vox populi vox Dei"

On Sunday evening the Prefect of the Seine gave a dinner at the Hôtel de Ville to the Ministers, the marshals of France, the mayors of the eighty-six departments of France, the generals of the army, and the principal judges of the courts of law. The President of the Republic, who was invited, excused himself from attending upon the ground of slight indisposition. At one extremity of the dining-hall, above the seats of honour, was placed the bust of Louis Napoleon, surrounded with flags ornamented with the Imperial eagle. Among the company present were the Ministers, Marshal Excelmans, Generals Magnan, Lowenstine, Lavasseur, Carrelet, Caurobert, Roguet, Cornemuse, and Courand; Col Fleury, the President's aide-de-camp; Col. Vieyra, the principal staff officer of the National Guard of Paris; and a number of naval, municipal, and other officials

The Prefect of the Seine, in proposing the health of the President of the Republic, said:—

To the health of the President of the Republic. To the consolidation of this new power, which seven million of suffrages have, for the second time, rendered the arbiter of our destinies. To the accomplishment of the most ardent wishes of Louis Napoleon, the glory and prosperity of France. (Applause.) May God grant this noble prize to his courageous and patriotic devotedness—Vive Napoléon! (Cries of "Bravo!" and "Vive Napoléon!")

M. de Morny, the Minister of the Interior, replied to the toast as follows:—

Gentlemen,—I cannot listen to these enthusiastic acclamations addressed to Louis Napoleon without deep emotion, for no one knows better than I do how much his deserves them (Applause.) No one has been in a better position than myself to appreciate his noble patience, his self-denial, and, may I say, his courage and devotion to the sacred duties confided to him. (Loud and long-continued applause and cries of "Vive Napoléon!") Allow me to say that I am the witness of France. (Yes, yes.) And Providence does not do things by halves. (Sensation. Great applause.) Now, gentlemen, I think I speak the sentiments of the Prince in thanking you for the zeal with which you have come to Paris to bring him the testimony of your sympathies and of the gratitude of the people, and in his name I drink to the delegates from all the departments of France. (Applause, and cries of "Vive Napoleon!")

On Monday the President gave a grand banquet at the Tuileries to the principal mayors and delegates of the departments. Four hundred guests sat down to table; and the splendid apartments of the palace were brilliantly illuminated, and the courtyard filled with troops.

On Tuesday evening he had the "Prophète" performed at the Grand Opera, for the entertainment of those gentlemen also. During the evening it was remarked that the rigorous etiquette of the ancient régime, which prescribed the maintenance of silence at the Cours dramatic entertainments, was in a great degree observed on this occasion The correspondent of the Morning Herald thus describes the scene:—

The house was ornamented with military trophies, and in the centre of the amphitheatre was constructed a canopy in velvet, richly ornamented with gold lace, and surmounted with a gold eagle with wings extended. Beneath this canopy, on a platform, seats were placed for the President and his suite. The front of the pit was occupied by general officers of the army of Paris; in the boxes to the right and left were the members of the corps diplomatique in court costume; the Princess Caumont, Madame Rogier, and the Countess de Moltke were remarkable for their beauty and for the brilliancy of their toilets. The other boxes were filled with elegantly-dressed ladies. The Princes Murat were in the box usually occupied by the President of the Republic. The delegates of the departments were placed in the orchestra; the pit, the balcon and the galleries were filled with officers of the army; and the upper galleries by the sub-officers. From the Boulevards to the Opera, as well as the theatre itself, the street was illuminated with gas on stands prepared expressly for the purpose.

After a vigorous cry of "Vive Napoléon!" on the entrance of the Prince, silence prevailed throughout the rest of the evening.

* * * * * * *

The drop scene, which fell at the end of the first act, was painted for the occasion. On it were written the words "Vox populi vox Dei," and beneath them "December 20 and 21." Between the first and second acts, the orchestra and the chorus sang a cantata in honour of "La victoire est à nous," from the "Carnavane du Caire." At the conclusion of this morceau, a loud cry from all parts of the house of "Vive Napoléon!" was raised. The performance terminated about twelve o'clock. On the President leaving the theatre he was hailed with great enthusiasm in the street, which resounded with cries of "Vive Napoléon!" "Vive l'Empereur!"

The Constitution has not yet been promulgated.

The Moniteur publishes an unusual number of decrees. General Gudin is promoted to the rank of General of Division, and equivalent rank to that of Generals of Brigade. A great number of appointments and promotions in the Legion of Honour are announced, and decrees appear removing the captains of several ships and frigates, and appointing new officers to command in their place.

The following ex-representatives have been liberated from St. Pélagie:—MM. Joret, Huguenin, Teillard-Laterisse, and Paulin Durieu. Twenty-five other ex-representatives still remain there. Colonel Forestier is also at St. Pelagie. M. Baune is at the prison Mazas.

There are 130 prisoners in Bordeaux charged with being concerned in the late insurrection.

It is said that the Generals confined at Ham will soon be set at liberty, "and allowed to travel for a year or so." General Lamoricière is suffering from rheumatism, occasioned by the dampness of his place of confinement.

On Saturday the Académie des Inscriptions at Belles Lettres elected its bureau for 1852. M. Natalis de Wailly was chosen president in place of M. Guizot, and M. Jomard vice-president in place of M. de Wailly. The Academy of Moral and Political Sciences also renewed its bureau on Saturday. M. Vivien was elected president in place of M de Tocqueville, and M. d'Amiron was chosen vice-president.

A marble bust of Champollion the younger, executed by M. Emile Thomas, is about to be placed in the Museum at the Palace of Versailles.

Two busts lately seen at the National Exhibition have been given to the Museum of the Louvre—that of N. Poussin, by M. Auguste Préaux; and that of Fragonard, by M. Antonin Moine.

The election returns from Algeria show that the votes of the people there were not very favourable to Louis Napoleon: 6527 voted for, and 5735 against, him; while 50,000 abstained altogether.

AUSTRIA.

A series of Imperial decrees were published at Vienna, on the 1st inst., formally abolishing the Constitution of the 4th of March, 1849, and all the political privileges and fundamental laws and rights conferred by it; and in its stead the old absolutist and bureaucratic system of administration is restored, with some modifications of minor details, as set forth in a sketch, given in one of the decrees, of the principles on which the future organisation of the state is to be based. Trial by jury and open courts are abolished, and the publicity of governmental or communal proceedings no longer tolerated. The proceedings in the superior provincial courts, and in the Supreme Court of Justice, are to be in writing, not oral; and the same civil and penal codes, the reorganisation of which will be immediately effected, are to be valid in all the provinces

The object which this new scheme of Government seeks to accomplish, is, that the countries united to the Austrian empire by virtue of ancient historical or new titles are to form the indivisible elements of an hereditary Austrian empire notwithstanding their irreconcilable differences of language, origin, and religion, and the antipathies and jealousies of race arising out of them—an end perfectly unattainable, and certain to be productive of vast evil, oppression, and suffering.

UNITED STATES.

The advices from New York this week are to the 24th ult., on which day a telegraphic despatch had been received from Washington, stating that the Capitol, in which Congress holds its sittings, was in flames. The fire was discovered about break of day, and, before assistance could be obtained, the valuable library of Congress was burnt. The telegraphic despatch adds that water was scarce, and it was impossible to use engines, buckets only being available. The weather was cold and frosty.

The public interest in Kossuth continued unabated. He had left New York for Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington, and will extend his tour to Cincinnati. The New York Tribune sums up the contributions to Kossuth, during his stay at New York, to 11,853 dollars 92 cents. In addition, he had received a present of 500 acres of land from Mr. O'Reilly, and a great number of books, maps, and other things from different persons; three gold rings, several beautifully-worked purses, a number of portraits, and a casket containing two bullets, one used at the battle of Bunker-hill and the other at the battle of New Orleans, as well as locks of hair of Washington and Napoleon.

The proceedings in Congress were of little interest. A debate on the Compromise Acts, in which Mr. Foote, of Mississippi, and Major Rhett, of South Carolina, the chief speakers, had consumed much time in the Senate. A message from the President, in answer to a resolution of the Senate calling for information on the subject of the firing into the Prometheus, had been presented. It declined to furnish the precise instructions forwarded to the United States Minister at the Court of St. James' on this delicate question. Mr. Carter (Democrat), of Ohio, moved the suspension of the rules, to enable him to introduce a resolution for the appointment of a committee of five to wait on Kossuth on his arrival at the capital, to introduce him to the House of Representatives. The motion was lost by a majority of 111 to 88. The bill establishing a mint in California had passed

The death of the Hon. Joel R Poinsett, formerly Secretary of War under the presidency of Mr. Van Buren, and at an earlier period Minister Plenipotentiary to Mexico during the administration of Mr. John Quincy Adams, is announced. He expired at his residence, in Statesburgh, South Carolina, on Friday, the 12th of December, at the venerable age of 77.

The advices from Central America relate principally to the question of the route to California. They were brought by the steam-ship Georgia, which arrived at New York on the 21st ult. from Chagres, with nearly 3,000 000 dollars in gold dust on freight and in the hands of passengers

The Georgia was detained three days and a half at Chagres by heavy weather, which prevented the landing and reception of passengers and freight. The current ran out of the river so strong that after several ineffectual attempts to enter the river it was found impossible to land. Captain Paine deemed it advisable to run the ship down to Navy Bay, and the passengers were landed there. Mr. J. L. Stephens, the energetic president of the railroad company, at first strongly objected to opening the road for travel until the connexion to Bayou Soldada was made, as he feared the influx of passengers would interfere with the progress of the work. He finally consented to the temporary use of the road; and for the first time, on the 8th of December, the passenger and freight trains were run over the road. All the passengers of the Georgia outward (say 700), together with Adams and Co.'s express, went over the road on the 8th; and the homeward passengers (850), with the mails and specie (the latter in charge of Mr. Paine, purser of the Georgia, who has earned the credit of bringing the first specie train over the Panama Railroad), came down on the 9th. Mr. Stephens confidently expected to have the road in running order to Bayou Soldada in two months. This will save nearly 40 miles of dangerous river navigation, and nearly one day in time. The company had fine passenger and baggage cars ready for use, and large hotels were being built to accommodate the travelling public when the road should be formally opened. The road at Gatun was in very good order, and the last down train brought 300 passengers, the mails, and specie, without detention or accident. Although the late rains had been the heaviest known for many years, Mr. Stephens asserted that in no place had the embankment given way, or the least injury been sustained by the road.

A severe gale had been experienced at Cruces (Isthmus of Panama), half of which town had been nearly washed away.

Accounts from San Juan del Norte report that Munoy had been banished to San Salvador. Rumours prevailed that another revolution had broken out in Nicaragua.

From Mexico we learn, under date the 18th of November, that a squadron of five British vessels had appeared off Vera Cruz.

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

The news received from the Cape this week is of a most disastrous character. The Kaffirs are not only able to maintain their ground against our troops, but have inflicted such losses on officers and men, that, in some localities, it was found advisable to withdraw from the unequal contest with the armed savages until reinforcements arrive. Meanwhile the Kaffirs have acquired the utmost confidence and enthusiasm in all their marauding expeditions, which were generally crowned with success, the lives and property of the unfortunate colonists being generally sacrificed to their revenge and rapacity wherever they chose to appear in large numbers.

The accounts are dated the 2d December, and show the hot character of the contest maintained during the preceding month against our troops by the Kaffirs, who, in a series of operations, fought with a determined bravery never before exhibited by them. On the 5th, 7th, and 8th November they maintained a formidable resistance in the Waterkloof against the troops under the command of Major-General Somerset. They were in great force, and fought with desperate courage. On this unfortunate occasion Lieut.-Colonel Lovedyce was killed, at the first volley on the 6th. The enemy was partially driven from his position, but, unfortunately, not without several other casualties among the troops. Lieutenant Cary, of the 74th, two sergeants, and two rank and file, were killed, and Lieutenant Gordon shot through both thighs (since dead), and eight men (all of the 74th Regiment) wounded. On the following day the operations were resumed, and the enemy was routed with considerable loss; but on our side Captain Devereux, of the Buffort West Levy, was mortally wounded in the head; three men of the 91st, and four of the levies, were also wounded. On the 8th, the weather proving extremely inclement, Major-General Somerset withdrew his troops to the camp in the Blinkwater, with the intention of undertaking no further movements against the enemy in that quarter at present.

The deaths of Captain Addison, of the 2nd Royals, and Ensign Ricketts, of the 91st, who were severely wounded in the battles of the Fish River Bush on the 14th of October, are also announced.

It is said that the troops are in a most dissatisfied state of mind at their continued ill-success, overpowered as they are by the superior numbers of the enemy; and it would appear as though there was a disposition on their part not to go out to be shot at with such fearful odds against them, if credit is to be given to a letter from General Somerset's camp, which says:—

Many openly declare they will go there no more to be butchered like cattle. It is a fearful sacrifice of human life to send men as brave as ever shouldered a firelock to such a place, with such an enemy to contend against. Courage here is of no avail; discipline and steadiness under fire only render the men better targets for the lurking savages.

The Governor, Sir H. Smith, was at King William's Town, in ill-health caused by over-exertion. He was concentrating a force of 3000 men for the purpose of despatching it across the Kei, into the territory of Kreli.

Her Majesty's steamer Vulcan, which left Queenstown for the Cape on the 10th October, with about 800 men, chiefly of the 43d Regiment, and some of the 12th Foot and the Lancers, had not arrived at the Cape on the 2d of December, when the accounts left

The draft ordinances, embodying the new colonial Constitution, arrived by the Propontis on the 31st of October. They were subsequently forwarded to King William's Town for the Governor's perusal, and when returned by him were published, on the 27th of November, in the Government Gazette. On the 28th they were read a first time in council, and their second reading was postponed for two months. The constitution embodied in these ordinances had given great satisfaction to the colonists, and this uncalled-for and unexpected postponement has caused extreme indignation.

Sir Andries Stockenstrom and Mr. Fairbairn had returned to the colony, where they were cordially welcomed by their fellow-colonists.

FATAL AFFAIR WITH NEGROES ON THE COAST OF AFRICA.

At the moment that the Screw Company's Cape Mail-packet Harlequin was leaving Sierra Leone for England, on the 17th December, her Majesty's screw-ship Niger, 14, Commander Heath, arrived from Lagos, and boarded her, with despatches from Commodore Bruce for England.

These despatches, it was understood, contain official information to the following effect:—That during some time there has been a display of more than usually hostile feeling between those on the coast who are desirous of suppressing slavery and a party whose "occupation has gone" by the activity of the cruisers in putting down the slave trade. The former party have been zealous in their endeavours to prevent the latter from the barracoon system from the interior to the coast for sale to the slavers, on the other hand, have attempted by every means to coerce our friends, until at length they have come to blows.

The Niger, cruising on the coast, determined on a demonstration against the blacks, landed her boats to protect our allies and to drive off their enemies, when a bloody encounter ensued, and the seamen and marines of the Niger, being overpowered by numbers, were obliged to retreat, fighting their way to their boats, with the disastrous casualties above reported

The commander-in-chief, Commodore Bruce, in the Penelope, 16, steam-frigate, Captain Lyster, with the Bloodhound and two other vessels of war, arrived off Lagos, from Ascension, after the fight, and, remaining there, dispatched the Niger to Sierra Leone, to complete provisions, and to take down a detachment of the West India Regiment, when it was expected the Commodore would commence active operations against the slave-dealing miscreants, and it is hoped, will inflict upon them such a chastisement as shall avenge the deaths of the gallant officers and seamen of the Niger, and shall finally put a finishing stroke to slave-dealing in that quarter of the coast.

THE DOMINICAN REPUBLIC, AND THE LIBERATOR GENERAL SANTANA.

IN THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS of December 27 we announced that Soulouque (or Faustin I.) had consented to a peace with the Dominican Republic, through the intervention of the English, French, and American Consuls; and we also published an illustration of the English and French steamers in the harbour of Gonaives, Hayti, the sight of whose guns made such an impression on the black Emperor. We now supply a Portrait of the Liberator General Santana, the cattle grazier in the province of Seybo, who was destined to free his country in 1843. Many of the Dominican Deputies (including the present President of the Republic, Senor Buenaventura) entered into negociations with the French Rear-Admiral Moages, M Barrot (then on a special mission), and M. Levasseur, resident French Consul-General in Portau-Prince (Hayti), for the French Protectorate of France (guarantéé), yielding to the French the fertile peninsula of Samana, with its large bay, one of the finest and most capacious harbours in the world, and which, in regard to its situation, is to the Gulf of Mexico what Mayotta is to the Indian Ocean; but the French agents refused to take upon themselves the responsibility of accepting these propositions until they had communicated with their Government at home. Pedro Santana was opposed to this intervention of France on such terms. M. de Juichereau, however, sent as consul of France to San Domingo, the French agents having obtained from Riviere an acceptance for him, no French consulate having existed before. All intrigues, native and foreign, were defeated by the rising of the Dominicans on the night of the 27th of February, 1844: they drove the Haytian garrison into the fort, and expelled four days afterwards, under M. de Juichereau's mediation. Pedro Santana, on the 28th of February, proclaimed the Dominican Republic in the province of Seybo: the people elected him general of brigade, and the Junta at San Domingo confirmed the appointment. On the news arriving at Port-au-Prince, the President Riviere marched with 20,000 men upon Azua, in the south part of San Domingo, and gave orders to General Pierrot to attack the northern provinces, and then to effect a juncture with him for a combined attack on the capital. Santana, having been directed by the Junta, on the 12th of March, 1844, to defend the eastern frontiers, boldly attacked and defeated Riviere at Azua on the 19th, but, being badly provisioned, and destitute of military stores, could not follow up his success. General Pierrot, however, was defeated at Santiago, and the Haytian troops then began to desert in masses. Riviere was superseded in his command, and banished; and his successor, General Souffron, was hotly pursued by Santana, whose courage and decision had won him the admiration and attachment of his army: he was proclaimed general of division in May, and the grade confirmed by the Junta. On the dissolution of the executive, Santana made a triumphal entry into San Domingo on the 13th of July. He was proclaimed "Gefe Supremo," supreme Chief and Dictator. He refused the title and the responsibility, but he organised a new Junta, who nominated him first President. The session of the first Congress commenced on the 24th of September, 1844, and Santana was elected a President of the Republic On the 16th of November he took the oath prescribed by the Constitution, but he had revolutionary dissensions to put down with a strong hand in February 1845, in July 1846, and December 1847. On the 4th of August, 1848, he resigned the Presidency and retired to his farm at the Prado, near Seybo. General Ximenes was his successor, and during his Presidency her Majesty's Government appointed a Consul, and thus acknowledged the independence of the Dominica Republic. In April, 1849, Soulouque invaded the country, and advanced to Azua. The consternation was great, and Santana, at the call of the people, quitted his farm, to command the army. When all was nearly lost, he had carte blanche. On the 21st of April Soulouque attacked Santana at the river Las Carreras, who had only 400 men, the Haytians amounting to 6000 men at Ocoa. The machète, a kind of sword resembling the boarding cutlass, is a most formidable weapon in the hands of a Dominican. Having fired their muskets, the Dominicans, with their machètes, under cover of the smoke, crossed the shallow part of the river, and boldly attacked the Haytian troops, who were so taken by surprise at the temerity of the onslaught that they gave way, and a panic ensued. They fled, leaving their guns and baggage on the field. This short battle of Las Carreras delivered the Dominicans of their invaders, but they suffered from internal civil war. The new President had been called upon by the people to resign his functions to Santana, but refused; the latter besieged the city; ultimately, through the intervention of the Consuls of England, France, and the United States, the President surrendered the city and embarked on board a British man-of-war for Curaçoa. Santana entered in triumph on the 30th of May, and acted as Chief until Senor Buenaventura was elected President. Santana then again retired to his farm, the nation evincing their gratitude by bestowing upon him the title of "Liberator of the Country;" and further decreed that his portrait, at the expense of the nation, should be placed in the palace between those of the immortal Columbus and the brave General Sanchez. A house within the city, the property of the nation, was also settled on Santana and his descendants in perpetuity.

Santana, in accomplishing his anxious desire for a private life, continued to advise when called upon. England has concluded a treaty of amity and commerce with the Dominican Republic, the ratifications of which were exchanged last year; but the Emperor Soulouque, yielding to the mediation of England and France, only recognised the independence of San Domingo last October.

The Dominican Republic has a population of about 220 000. Our trade there is the largest of any nation. The flag of the Republic is alternately quartered blue and red, divided in the centre by a white cross of half the breadth of the quarters. The arms of the Republic are a cross, against the foot of which the open Bible is placed, surrounded by a trophy of arms and the motto of the Republic, "God, Country, and Liberty."

Pedro Santana, Commander-in-Chief of the Army of the Dominican Republic, was born June 29, 1801, in the small town called Hincha. In figure he is not much above the middle height, but is portly and of muscular make, although he is suffering from infirmities engendered by hard-ships during his campaigns. He stoops slightly. His face indicates strong energy and determined resolution; his forehead is shaded with black hair, but is not lofty; his eyebrows are thick, and cover a pair of piercing eyes, which flash fire when aroused to passion. He wears bushy whiskers, but no moustache. He has a sallowish-ruddy complexion. In his dress he displays a marked contrast to the Emperor Soulouque—Santana the Liberator avoiding all ornaments. He is mild and gentlemanlike, but cautious in conversation, and listens and ponders well before he delivers an opinion. But, when he is roused and becomes animated, he speaks in the strong dialect of his province, with a harsh intonation, and uses emphatic gestures, without, however, losing command of himself. This remarkable man in his own house is perfectly well-bred and free from ostentation. His serious demeanour might lead strangers to suppose that he is austere. He has unbounded authority and prestige over his soldiers: he wins them by an insinuating address, and awes them by the air of authority with which nature has stamped him. He lived in affluence previous to the revolution which we have described elsewhere, but he sacrificed his property to assist in the work of effecting the separation, and his means are now much reduced, and the Dominican Republic, having been oppressed with a war of seven years' duration, is not able to make him a compensation for his losses. Long previous to his having been called into active life on behalf of his country, he was esteemed as a laborious and upright man, engaged in commercial transactions, and his credit was unlimited in San Domingo. Latterly, Santana turned his attention more to the cutting of mahogany and the rearing of cattle and horses. So much were his character and judgment respected, that he was always consulted in difficulties by his neighbours, and he gained a kind of patriarchal sway in his province. Santana is married, but has no children.

When the Emperor Soulouque was organising, a few months since, measures for another invasion of San Domingo, by assembling large masses of Haytian troops at the frontiers of the Dominican Republic, Santana again quitted his farm to defend his country. But we learn, from the latest advices (Oct. 25th), that, British, American, and French intervention having secured the independence of the republic, the Liberator had returned to his home, after disbanding the civic guard.

PAMPAS GRASS.

THIS magnificent specimen of the giant vegetation of South Brazil is now flourishing at St. Wolstan's, near Dublin. The Pampas grass, Cynerium argenteum of botanists is a native of the extensive flat plains of South Brazil, called "Pampas" by the natives. It was introduced to Europe by Mr. Moore, of the Royal Botanic Gardens, Glasnevin, Dublin, in the year 1841, who then received seeds of it from Mr. John Tweedie, of Buenos Ayres. It has been found sufficiently hardy to withstand the rigours of the severest winters which have occurred during the last ten years, without protection, in the several parts of Britain where it has been tried. It is difficult to convey an adequate idea of the beauty of this gigantic grass by a Sketch. In Ireland, where it appears to grow with most luxuriance, the flower-stems attain to a height of from ten to twelve feet, and are produced abundantly.

PAMPAS GRASS.

The plant generally begins to bloom about the beginning of October, and continues in perfection until the end of November. It is suitable for being grown as a single specimen, on a grass lawn, or for any portion of pleasure-ground, especially that near water. There is, perhaps, none of our recently-introduced hardy plants calculated to produce a finer effect than the Pampas grass.

KAFFIR BOY, FROM GRAHAM'S TOWN.

THE KAFFIR WAR.

THE intelligence received on Tuesday from the seat of war in Kaffraria is of a disastrous character. Led on by Hottentots, the enemy continues to make predatory incursions on the colonists—stealing their cattle, burning their farmsteads, and murdering the inhabitants wherever they can secure them. A summary of the events will be found in another column. We here engrave an interesting locality, from a Sketch by an obliging correspondent.

Committee is a detached post, about 23 miles from Graham's Town with a dense bush of nearly 15 miles on each side of the road leading to it, and where the Kaffirs make such great inroads in the colony during war time; it being so bushy that in their return from the colony with stolen cattle they can immediately, on being pursued by our troops, conceal themselves, and are naturally fortified. The post is one in connexion with many others of from 11 to 14 miles from each other, established as a protection to the line of frontier of the colony, with part of the Great Fish River for its boundary, with the Kaffir territory on the opposite side. Committee is capable of holding about 50 to 100 men, but during peace there is generally 1 officer and 30 rank and file.

Accompanying is a Sketch of a Kaffir Boy, who, in 1843, followed his master, an officer in the army (from Graham's to Cape Town), 600 miles, to go with him to England, as his mother said he was never to leave him, he is supposed to be the first Kaffir, or the first of his tribe, that was ever brought to England; but, in consequence of the coldness of the climate, he was obliged to return the following year to his native country.

The Portrait is from a drawing by Mr. R. H. C. Ubsdell, of Portsmouth

COURT AND HAUT TON.

THE COURT AT WINDSOR CASTLE.

The past week has been a very quiet one in Court life. The Queen and the Prince Consort, with the youthful members of the Royal family, have taken their accustomed walks daily.

On Sunday, after an early walk in the Home Park, her Majesty and his Royal Highness, with the Prince of Wales and the Princess Royal, attended Divine service in the private chapel of the Castle.

On Monday the Countess de Neuilly and the Duchess of Orleans paid a visit to her Majesty.

On Tuesday and Wednesday the Prince Consort enjoyed the sport of shooting, accompanied by Sir William Middleton, and attended by the Hon. F. Morley, Captain the Hon. J. Denman, and Colonel F. H. Seymour.

The Duchess of Orleans visited her Majesty on Wednesday, and partook of luncheon. On the same day the Marquis of Lansdowne, the Duke of Somerset, the Marquis and Marchioness of Westminster, and Lady Octavia Grosvenor, arrived at the Castle on a visit to her Majesty and the Prince Consort.

Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Cambridge will, it is understood, by permission of her Majesty, in future occupy the apartments lately filled by the King of Hanover in St. James's Palace. Her Royal Highness is shortly expected to return to this country from Germany.

Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Gloucester entertained a select party at dinner on Monday evening at Gloucester House. The party included the Countess of Jersey and the Lady Clementina Villiers, the Earl and Countess Craven, the Hon. Colonel Liddell, &c.

The venerable Duke of Somerset has quite recovered from his recent indisposition, and the Graces will shortly resume their dinner and evening parties.

The Duke and Duchess of Buccleuch are entertaining a select circle at Drumlanrig Castle, Dumfriesshire. The youthful Lord Henry Scott, who is staying at Malta, was, according to the last letters, improving in health.

The Marquis of Worcester arrived at Beaufort-house, on Saturday, from Badminton. His Lordship has been to visit the bears of his relatives, Upton Somerset, M.P., of the 1st battalion Rifle Brigade, and the Hon. Leicester Curzon, whilst gallant officers have embarked with their regiment on board the Admiral Boxer transport, Captain Edward Gage.

The Marquis and Marchioness of Salisbury gave a magnificent ball and supper on Friday night week, at the family seat in Hertfordshire, to upwards of 1300 of the nobility and gentry of the county, as well as a large and fashionable circle of friends staying at the mansion.

The Marchioness of Ailesbury, who joined the circle visiting the Earl of Cardigan, at Deene Park, last week, left that seat, on Tuesday, to visit the Earl De Grey, at Wrest Park, Beds.

The Earl De Grey is entertaining a large party of fashionables at his splendid seat, Wrest Park. The Earl and Countess Cowper, Viscount and Viscountess Canning, Mr. and Lady Mary Vyner, Lady Stuart de Rothesay, and many of the neighbouring nobility and gentry, are amongst the visitors. The noble Earl has had a temporary amateur theatre erected, and a series of theatrical performances are about to take place.

The Earl of Morley and Capt. Hon. J. Denman have relieved the Marquis of Ormonde and Colonel N. Hood in the duties of Lord and Groom in Waiting to her Majesty.

The Earl of Dartmouth has left St. James's-square for Sandwell Hall, Staffordshire. The noble Earl came from his seat to take leave of the son, the Hon. George Legge, who was embarked with his regiment (the Rifles) for the Cape of Good Hope.

The Countess of Dunraven gave birth to a son (still-born), on the 2d inst., at his seat of Sir Robert Gore Booth, Bart., M.P.

Viscount Beresford continues in very indifferent health at Bedgebury Park. Mr. A. B. Hope, M.P., and Lady Mildred Hope are staying with the noble and gallant Viscount.

Lord and Lady Lyndhurst have been passing the holidays in town, in consequence of the continued indisposition of his Lordship's youngest daughter, the Hon. Miss Copley.

His Excellency the French Ambassador and the Countess Walewski have left the French Embassy, in Grosvenor-square, for Broad lands, on a visit to Viscount and Viscountess Palmerston. Lady William Russell has left town for Broadlands, also Sir Edward and Lady Lytton Bulwer.

His Excellency the Marquis d'Azaglio, Sardinian Minister, has returned to his residence in Berkeley-square, after a few weeks' stay in Paris.

Monsieur Drouet has returned from the Continent to take the direction of the Belgian Legation during M. Van de Weyer's absence.

We regret to learn that no amendment has taken place in the health of the Earl Brownlow, whose condition occasions much uneasiness to the members of his family.

The health of Lord Panmure continues, we regret to learn, in a rather precarious state. The improvement which recently took place did not continue, and great solicitude exists as to the issue.

Prince Albert has intimated to the Government School of Mines the intention of the Prince of Wales to grant two annual exhibitions (to be named the "Duke of Cornwall's Exhibitions"), the annual value of each sufficient to defray the expenses of the course of instruction at that institution.

ALLEGED MARRIAGE OF PRINCE NAPOLEON.—The Breslau Gazette has the following from Vienna, 27th ult.:—"M. de Persigny is expected here from Berlin, and it is to proceed to St. Petersburg, to explain the intentions of the President of the French Republic with respect to his home and foreign policy, and to endeavour to secure the support of the northern powers. At the same time he will demand the hand of the wealthy Princess Wasa for Prince Napoleon. The Princess is nearly the same age as the President, and no doubt is entertained here that she will consent. In that case her illustrious brother will give up his grade of colonel in the Austrian army, and will be appointed to elevated functions in France." A Frankfort journal says that M. de Persigny is expected in that city on a special mission to the Germanic Confederation.

AUSTRALIAN PROSPECTS.—The following is an extract from a private letter, dated Sydney, May 24:—"During my thirteen years' residence in this colony, although I landed with not more than twenty sovereigns, I have, in spite of many losses in trade, arising principally from my not having been brought up with habits of business, contrived to make myself (with sometimes more than £4000; but what the prospects are for getting on in the world, now that this important discovery (gold) has been made, go beyond my power of determining. My sorrow to all and any of you, who may find it hard to bring up a family in London, would most decidedly be to come to this colony. The climate (like the south of Europe), the abundance of the necessaries of life, and all the blessings of a new country—as the absence of poor-rates, taxation, and freedom from that disheartening competition in every employment at home—were, previously to the discovery of gold, great inducements to parties to emigrate here; but now, when, from the highly remunerative employment of digging, the working man will be assured of a permanent high rate of wages, my opinion decidedly is, that no country on the face of the earth can compare with the British colony of Australia. There is room here for numbers of thousands—no fear of the thing being overdone—and, what is more, the old system does here, instead of looking upon you with a jealous eye, as in America, where you must reside five years before you can become a citizen, welcomes you with open arms. The boundless flocks and herds will perish in great numbers for the next twelve months, for want of hands to care for them. Then, again, it has been found by widely-extended experiment, during the past two years, that cotton will grow here almost well; so that the countryman in particular will, on landing, be bewildered to choose between the many different most promising employments which invite him to make money."

TREACHERY OF ENGLISHMEN BY THE AUSTRIANS.—Florence, Dec. 20th. The openly-avowed principle of rendering the Continent uninhabitable by Englishmen has received a new development of an incident that has just occurred here. Yesterday morning, a young Englishman, named Mayhew, who had only been a short time in Florence, after standing to listen to the band of an Austrian regiment, was quietly proceeding along one of the narrow streets which issue from the Piazza del Duomo. He had not gone far, when he perceived a bancino advance rapidly towards him with all the speed at which these country cars are usually driven. To avoid the danger, he jumped suddenly back, and in doing so came in contact with a young Austrian officer, who was in the same moment coming up at the head of his guard. A smart blow from the fist of a sabre on the back was the mild rebuke for this purely accidental collision! The Englishman, very naturally indignant, demanded in the unspeakable the meaning of the outrage. A few angry words were interchanged on either side, when another officer, who accompanied the party, stepped forward and cut the young Englishman down, laying his head open by a sabre wound of fully a finger's length. This done, the party proceeded on its way, and on returning, whose blood covered a considerable space in the street, was conveyed to the City Hospital. I have only to add, that among solitary men of every [illegible], of which there are individuals at present here, but one opinion prevails in this event that it was brutal and unsoldierlike, totally uncalled for by the event, and weakening as great a degree of cowardice as want of self command. It will satisfy Mr Mayhew's friends to learn that his wound, though severe, is not dangerous, and that he is receiving every attention of skill and kindness in the chief of the hospitals.—Correspondence of the Morning Post

THE GOLD DISTRICTS OF AUSTRALIA.—Accounts have been received by the ship Hindostan, dated Port Phillip, the 1st of September, which represent the gold seeking operations in that district as being very successful. The Hindostan has brought home the first samples from the Clarence Diggings in the Pyrrenees. Further discoveries of gold had been made at the Victoria, Bunnaong, and Banke's Marsh Diggings, just before the Hindostan sailed, and fears were entertained at the shooting the labouring population would leave for the mines in the summer, and thus cause considerable difficulty in securing the [illegible] and harvest.

INAUGURATION OF LOUIS NAPOLEON.—EXTERIOR OF THE CATHEDRAL OF NOTRE DAME.

INAUGURATION OF LOUIS NAPOLEON.—INTERIOR OF THE CATHEDRAL OF NOTRE DAME.—SEE P. 41.

INAUGURATION OF LOUIS NAPOLEON.

ON New Year's-day the grand ceremonial of the inauguration of Louis Napoleon, as President of the French Republic, took place in the Cathedral of Notre Dame, at Paris. We have elsewhere glanced at the long line of similar events of which this ancient edifice has been the scene, but it would be difficult to point out one of those episodes which is more deeply suggestive of the vicissitudes of French political life than the ceremonial of Thursday week.

THE PAGEANT TO THE CATHEDRAL.

The weather was most appropriate for the occasion, ice cold being excessively severe, and a thick fog during the whole day, but particularly in the morning, enveloping Paris. The appearance of the open space in front of the Cathedral or, as it is technically designated, the parvis, was exceedingly striking. Down the wide length of the Rue du Parvis, whichever way one came from, troops were ranged in fifty ranks; further down in the open space itself, more elevated flagstaffs bore aloft longer streamers; whilst close on the entrance the tricoloured flags were intertwined with gilt spears, gilt eagles bordered with silver stars, crowned by the cap or the Prince Louis Napoleon, as it was formerly of the Emperor his uncle. Springing from the fretwork of the old Cathedral, immediately over the grand entrance, was erected a selerne or loge, for the President, not yet, once mented with gold embroidery, under which the President was to alight from his carriage. On each side floated green flags, bearing the letters "L. N." within a laurel wreath. Beyond these, at each side, trophies were erected, with a shield in the centre, also bearing the same initials, the whole surmounted by a tricoloured flag, artistically arranged, and further on, at each corner of the front of the building, were lofty bannerets of green velvet, with the initials in the centre. In the recess of the grand portal were temporary pews and ancient tapestry hangings of scarlet over the latticed windows of the Cathedral, and over the gilt flags, and above these, surmounting the Gothic arches, were escutcheons of various colours, bearing the capital towns of the departments, and the colonies with their respective arms. The façade above was hung with draperies of crimson velvet and gold, the whole prettily relieved with gilt stars and wreaths; and each side of the large rose window of the centre were placed two painted panels, representing—on the right, Charlemagne, and St. Louis; and on the left, Louis XIV and Napoleon.

At an early hour the troops were marched to their stations, with bands playing and banners unfurled, and rein ins of the line, Cuirassiers, artillery, sappers and miners, Municipals, Republican Guard, and, in fact, every division of the new Government were called into requisition.

Shortly as eight o'clock, notwithstanding the fog and frost, eight-laving Paris was all astir to the spectacle, rolling in a huge stream towards the Cathedral, like to the Seine whence Paris first sprang, and where its Cathedral now stands.

At ten the cannon of the Invalides gave the signal for the troops to emerge from their barracks and take up their positions. Ten guns were fired for the salution of vowes. It is said that eighty were discharged in all. (Notre Illustration at page 33.) The whole of the Boulevards from the Rue de la Paix to the Rue Drouot, along the quays, was occupied by a double line of infantry. Each regiment marched, its band ahead, and for the first time since the end of December the drums were heard. Certain streets were entirely occupied by companies of the troops of the line, who were to be present at the ceremony.

At a quarter to twelve a buzz gave note of the President's approach. He was preceded by a long cavalcade of escorts and orderlies, who, in a manner, formed a line or lane for the two deep Gothic portals of the church. The President was in a coach drawn by four horses, with postilions in green and gold liveries. His two officiers d'ordonnance, Léger Nevveu and Fleury, rode at either panel, and his coach was much greater than on ordinary occasions. The pageant was altogether more imposing and magnificent.

INTERIOR OF THE CATHEDRAL.

The coup d'œil on entering the Cathedral was equally striking and impressive. The pillars were hung with imperial purple, coloured with golden stars, and they always everywhere the initials "L. N." Between every two pillars was suspended a chandelier of cut glass, containing 45 wax lights; and down the centre aisle three ranges of chandeliers were hung from the fretted roof. In addition to all these lights many candelabras were to be seen above, at the back of the trib unes, erected half up between the pillars, for the public; and at the same back the gilt trellis screens were placed on each side of the altar, and the area below, filled by candelabras of gilt bronze stood along the circular sweep, to the number of seven dozen of lights. The whole number of wax lights burning was 13 000 Velvet draperies, and enormous garlands of lilies and flowers depending from these latter, richly decorated flags, and the blaze of hundreds of wax lights met the eye; and at the extreme end the columns of the sanctuary might be seen covered from base to capital with rich silk brocade of crimson and gold The altar in the choir, with its glittering ornaments, the benches for the authorities and constituted bodies, the galleries on either side crowded with spectators in full dress, and, above all, and filling the principal feature of the gorgeous scene, the lofty Gothic arches, with their rich tracery, and the whole with white satin, surmounting the estrade which faced the principal altar, and help ing the seat and president of Louis Napoleon—seen under his aspect, the ancient Cathedral presented a most magnificent appearance. Immediately above the altar, and midway between it and the canopy, a lofty shrine was erected in the Byzantine style, as it were, protecting the altar and what it bore, a repeated cross of the form cross con fronte is seen over the Holy Sepulchre at Rome. Above the altar were all of silver gilt, the candlesticks (14 in number) being five feet high.

The manner in which the building was arranged for the ceremony was alike simple and convenient. The centre aisle was only used on the occasion, the side aisles being employed as passages to the tribunes; those on the right were reserved for the public, and those on the left for the members of the diplomatic body, the councils, and a portion of the public functionaries. The transepts were converted into immense amphitheatres of seats, the right being appropriated to the bar, the diplomatic body, the council of state, Pairs, the Institute, the municipal bodies of the banlieue, &c.; and the left to the Ministers, the Prefect of the Seine, the Prefect of Police, the academic body, the corps de jour, &c. The lower part of the central aisle was reserved only occupied by the officers of the staff, and those appointed from the different departments of War and its vicinity.

In front of the screen before the choir was erected the altar, which was covered with white silk, embroidered with gold. At some distance from it was placed the President's chair and prie-dieu. Behind him were seats for the marshals of France and for the officers of the President's household. The canopy were assigned seats on the right, just below the benches appropriated to the bar, &c.

About half past nine the grand portal was opened, by which the Mass era, the deputation, and other persons had entered before the President arrived.

About half-past ten the tribunes were nearly all filled, and at eleven every place was occupied. The cold was intense, notwithstanding the heat emitted by the vast number of lights; but the solemnity of the scene was not at all impaired, decidedly much less than in general is seen at public spectacles in France.

About a quarter past eleven o'clock the Ministers arrived and took their places on the left, and, many facts after, a considerable number of military officers. Amongst the first was General de la Rondière, an old cavalry officer of the Empire, with his left arm wanting; then, General Lebreton, Commune, Count Lebreton, Duke Forel, and several other Legislators also took places and Marshal. A special interest was excited by the appearance of Marshals Excelmans and Jerome Bonaparte, the ex-King of Westphalia, who entered together, the uncle of the President following his younger fellow-soldier. They both took their seats behind the President's chair of state, the Prince de Canino, Joseph Bonaparte, not appearing at the latter of the December.

A little later the ambassadors of the foreign powers began to arrive; they came in grand official costume. One of the first in the high functionaries who arrived was the Marquis of Normanby. The corps diplomatique was assembling in uniforms, and amongst them was Mr Reeves, the American Minister, who appeared in the same dress for the first time in the Republic. (Vide coup d'œil.) The Pope's Nuncio was also present, and in full sacerdotal dress.

It was very near twelve when the Archbishop of Paris and the clergy moved down the aisle to receive and conduct the President. Only one bishop was present during the day with the Archbishop, namely, the Bishop of St Flour, situated in the south of France; the rest of the sacerdotal cortège was composed of curates and curés in grand ecclesiastical costume. Just as the long array set out to grand entrance, the drums beat to arms, the bourdon, or great bell of Notre Dame, pealed forth, and Louis Napoleon descended from his carriage. In a few seconds he was received by the Archbishop of Paris, and the cry of "Vive le Président!" the reputed morsel of the true cross, to kiss; presenting to him the holy water, and then, turning round, led him in procession to the altar. Two Prelates followed immediately in the rear of the President, the Bishop of Nancy and the Bishop of St Dié. Marshal Magnan, the ex-Minister of War, and on his left, General Magnan. He was covered with the cross of Notre Napoleon," which is known oldest by all gilty bowing. He wore the ribbon of a general of the army, by cravat of the Legion of Honour, and the red ribbon as grand cordon of that order.

The President at once proceeded to his seat, the orchestra, organ, and singers Bursting forth at the intoning of "Domine salvum fac Ludovicum Napoleonem," Emperor's coronation. The whole of the spectators stood up as he passed with his splendid staff; and all, even the military, stood uncovered during his passage from the grand entrance to the choir of state.

"Exaudiat" responded the other side universal cries of "Vive Napoleon!"

After the "Grand March" came the "Vivat," and then the "Te Deum." Subsequently was executed, all in the most admirable style, the "Domine Salvum fac Napoleonem." During the Archbishop's part the benediction of the ceremony terminated. The clergy then, as before, led the way, and the President departed nearly as he had entered. The orchestra raised a lively dance as he departed, the bourdon again boomed forth, the cannon of the Invalides thundered out from their iron throats, and, lastly, the vast multitude in the Cathedral shouted "Vive Napoleon!"

The President then entered his carriage, and proceeded to the Tuileries.

After the return of the President to the Tuileries, a reception of the public bodies, military officers, National Guards, and all deputations of departments took place. Nothing less than from 7000 to 8000 officers paid their respects, and about half a battalion of the Imperial armies, comprising every arm of the service, saluted Louis Napoleon. Amongst these last were two Mamelukes, one of them a field-officer, and the whole of the National Guard were also in great numbers. While the ceremony was going on the Place de la Carrousel was occupied by bodies of cavalry, and the crowds of courts by artillery. (See the Illustration at page 33.) The ceremony lasted until half past five, when a grand banquet, of 400 covers, was given at the President's magnificent entertainments; and at night the theatres and public buildings were illuminated.

CEREMONIALS IN THE CATHEDRAL OF NOTRE DAME.

IT was in this Cathedral that in the year 7 4 the Pope Hirens consecrated and anointed the King Pepin, his wife, and his two sons. On the 18 h of August, 1572, only six days before the massacre of St. Bartholomew, the wedding of the King of Navarre, afterwards Henry the Fourth, with Margaret of Medicis, was splendidly celebrated in the same church. On the 27th of October, 1721, a "Te Deum" was chanted at Notre Dame to celebrate the birth of the Dauphin of France; and on the 9th of August, 1760, another "Te Deum" was again chanted, by order of the Archbishop Jugnè, to return thanks for the abolition of the titles and feudal tithes.

On the 8th of November, 1714, the Archbishop of Paris, Gobel, ascended the pulpit of the Cat edral, wherein he so amply declared he had been, during sixty years, a lyp critic, and that the reugion he had professed since his childhood was ton idol in error and falsey

On the 10th of November, 1793, the National Convention received from the Archbishop of Paris, and the Bishops making that number, as well as the twelve vicars of the Cathedral, had resigned their duties as Catholic priests The Convention publi hed, without any contest, a decree announcing that the Catholic worship was abolished. By the same decree it was resolved that the worship of Human Reason would take place of the ancient religion. The consequence was, that the church, wh ch had been, hitherto called Notre Dame, assumed the name of Temple of Reason.

On the same day, in the nave of the Temple, was erected an artificial mountain, the summit of which was crowned by a tripode with this inscription over the principal entrance:—"To Philosophy." On the declivity of the hill an altar was also erected, and ornamented with oak leaves and the brilliant torch of Truth. Two sets of young girls dressed in white, adorned with wreaths of oak leaves, and with a torch in their hands, descended the hill. Next, the goddess Reason presented by a young and handsome lady, dressed in a white robe half covered with a blue mantle, her hair flowing freely on her shoulders, and a Phrygian red cap on her head, came out of the Temple of Philosophy, and sat down on a grass bench, where she received the homages and oath of the municipal officers in mass. In the evening, the Convention, en masse, went to the Temple to chant with the people the hymn to Reason.

On the 30th of June, 1801, was held in the Cathedral a national council, consisting of forty-nine bishops and above eighty deputies of the French clergy. The leading speech was delivered by the Reverend Abbé Gregoire, member of the Legislative Body, and bishop elect of Blois.

On the 14th of July, 1804, a high altar and mass as well as a "Te Deum," were chanted, to return thanks for the various benefits which the French people had received from the reign of Napoleon. Easter Sunday, 1810.

On the 25th of April, 1822, on Easter day, was celebrated the public signature of the concordat between the Holy See and the French Government, and the return to of the Bourbons to the throne of France. Easter Sunday, 1823, was the day when the law restoring religious worship to all the churches in France was published in the Parish of Paris. At seven o'clock the three Consuls went to the church in its usual carriages, preceded by horses richly caparisoned and led by Egyptian Mamelukes. Behind followed the carriage of Madame Bonaparte, who was accompanied by her daughter and her sister-in-law. The ladies were seated in a splendid gilt state coach, and which a few months after was destroyed. The Consuls were received at the portal at entrance of the nave by the Archbishop of Paris; they were then introduced, and had their seats under a canopy of state on the left and right of the altar. After the Gospel the Archbishop and the Bishops offered up the prayers of the Church for the Consuls of the nation and all nations lives of the French Consuls. Subsequently they took their seats in the presence of Napoleon, the First Consul. Lillay Legate of the Pope chanted a "Te Deum." The music of which, composed by Lesueur, was splendidly executed by two bands, conducted by both Cherubini and Martini. Mme La Brun, daughter of the President of the Palace, and Madame Savary, wife of an aide-de-camp of the first Consul, made a collection, the amount of which was no less than 70 0 louis d'or. The ceremony lasted three hours. During which time salutes were fired without any intermission, and a merry peal in a few days Dance announced the happy news to the three hundred parishes of the capital.

When Napoleon Bonaparte was proclaimed Emperor, and his coronation by the Pope was decided on, it was resolved to make the ceremony as gorgeous and magnificent as possible. Notre Dame was again chosen for the solemnity, when some important alterations were made within and without the edifice. The vestry was pulled down on the south side, a grand private tribune in the nave, and the north entrance of the Church; and portals of the beautiful façade, which for many centuries had remained in obscurity, were then discovered.

On the 1st of December, 1804, the ceremony of the coronation, in the midst of the severe cold, was performed, with the greatest magnificence. At ten o'clock both Pope Pius VII. and the Emperor set out from the Palace of the Tuileries for the Cathedral. The immense passages were lined with guards and all in full dress. The grand officers of the empire, loaded with decorations, earthe ensigns and imperial garments, the sceptre, the hand of justice, the orb, and the crown, which was placed upon the head of the Emperor, were received and anointed by the Pope; but Napoleon placed himself the crown on his head

The part of the ceremonia which had taken place in Notre Dame, the coronation of Napoleon was, without doubt, the most gorgeous and resplendent. The Queen of the Cathedral, with its Gothic arches and its richly-coloured glass; the throne, the canopy of the altar, the ancient walls, covered with magnificent tapestries; all the great officers of the Empire, the deputies of all the cities of France; thousands of feathers from the hats of the senators, state councillors, tribunes, &c.; the Chancellor and Justice Cambs, with their rich yet severe costumes, the cardinals and bishops were by a host of the most illustrious generals in the French army; the clergy in their robes; thousands of young and beautiful ladies in the most elegant fashion, bursting alone up the first floor both of the nave and the choir; finally the lady Leitzer and the Empress, wearing the insigns of their high dignities, presented a coup d'œil of which it is difficult to form a notion.

La patrie was announced that the wedding of the Duke of Berry with the Princess Anna was celebrated on the 17th of June, 1816, in Notre Dame, and on the 22nd of May, 1841, the Count of Paris, grandson of Louis Philippe, was christened in the same place.

Already the piers for the piers of the centre span have been nearly raised above the level of the stream commonly at high water. The site of the bridge is between the gardens of Chelsea Hospital, and whichat one time formed a portion of the famed Ranelagh gardens, but which is now also better than a mass of building of an old-fashioned description, by means of which the approaches to the new bridge. The main street leading from the bridge on the Middlesex side will terminate in the vicinity of Eaton-square, and the new line of communication and of street are to be of the second class, and the carriage-way finished in a similar way to that lately laid on the Marquis of Westminster's property at Chelsea and Pimlico.

The second of the series took place at Exeter-hall on Thursday night, under the direction of Mr. T. H. Severn. The solo instruments were Miss Goddard, the accomplished pianiste, who played Thalberg's "Don Pasquale" serenade, and an andante and rondo capriccioso by Mendelssohn; and Mr. Richardson, who performed his "Rule Britannia" variations. The vocalists were Miss Louisa Pyne, Miss Pyne, Miss Bunkes, Mr. Swift, Herr Jaquin de, Mr. C. Cotton, and Mr. Wallworth. The madrigals in the scheme were Wilye's "Sweet honey-sucking Bees," and "Flora gave me fairest flowers" (1595); Bowlan's "Awake, sweet love" (1597); Edwards' "In going to my lonesome bed" (1564); and Morley's "Now is the month of Maying" (1595). Lord Mornington's glee, "Here in cool grot;" Dr. Cooke's glee "Hand in hand;" and T. Attwood's trio, "Hark! the cori ch's solemn sound," were included in the programme.

MUSICAL EVENTS.

The Bach Society had a monthly meeting last Monday, for trial of the vocal music of J. S Bach, under the direction of Mr Surenden Bennet.

The soirées musicales of the "Reunion des Arts" recommenced on Wednesday.

There was an evening concert at the Sussex Hall, in the City, on Wednesday, at which Miss Dolby, Miss Pyne, Miss S. Jacobs, Messrs. Swift, Wallworth, and Herr Joachimann, were the vocalists; and Miss Kate Loder, Mr. Richardson, and M. Sainton were the instrumentalists.

On Monday afternoon the prize of ten guineas for the best "original quadrille" was awarded by the majority of a jury of amateurs and professors, including the names of Sir Henry Webb, Captain de Bathe, Mr. Albert Smith, Mr. Charles Kenny, Mr Sams, Mr. Leef, Mr. Arthur Chappel, Mr C. L. Gruneisen, Mr Wilbert Bass, Mr. V. Harris, Mr H. Mayhew, Mr. Howard, N. Nathan, Mr. Pratten, Mr. Godfrey &c., to Mr. J. R. Tatton. The other competitors were Mr. C. Coote, Mr. F. G. Penney, Mr. J. G. Cullerne, Mr. W. A. Montgomery, and Mr. Henry Farmer. The conditions of the contest were, that the quadrille should be preceded by an introduction, and that all the subjects should be distinct and original melodies. Now, we cannot state that any of the competitors, including the successful one, have fulfilled the conditions of the contest. There was much cleverness and brilliancy, but a decided originality did not strike the ear. In fact, the composition marked A was the most striking; but then, that which was the letter I was the most flexible, the introduction being altogether by no means, to be decided, a strong point. But the prize of the quadrille B (the winner) carried the day, and then it had the good fortune to be played last. Mr. Laurent has announced a similar prize for the best polka. He conducted the performance of the first trial quadrille, with his usual best spirit and precision. The vote of the jury was taken by ballot, and the proceedings were so regulated that the audience knew nothing of the result until the pieces were executed, and only were made acquainted with the name of the winner of the prize by the opening of the envelope B, each quadrille having been sealed in sealed, and marked only by a letter.

Next Tuesday, Mr. Aguilar, the pianist, has announced, will commence a series of soirees classiques

THE THEATRES

DRURY LANE.

Mr. Bunn has announced that Miss G an will shortly appear in "her popular character of Cleopatra." We do not know who that character is. We call their attention to to mise en scene, and even the saloons are distinguished by the coolness of their accessories. It is to be hoped that capital with this tragedy will be placed on the stage, as the success may of securing the very best monies from the pit. The tragedy of "Antony and Cleopatra," with Miss Gan as the heroine, if adequately placed on the boards, would command full houses for at least a century of nights. We trust that a clever manager will not fail in matter in the correct hand, and do justice to himself and the wonderful drama he is about to produce.

PUNCH'S PLAY HOUSE.

After an absence of eight years, Mrs. Charles Selby has reappeared on the stage, and selected the little strand theatre as the scene of her renewed efforts. A new piece has been provided for her, written by Mr. Selby, entitled "An Adventure in Search of Society," in which Mrs. Selby is the character of a fast matronly lady, and performs it with wonderful point and effect. Mrs. General Hydraulics is of the military order of heroines, and calls back many times. Rendered perfect by the excellent company of this theatre, the piece has been sufficient company, but these have been mere puppets, worked with comparatively little skill, and scarcely approaching the combination of the mechanical and intellectual, which the Marionettes at present possess. The scenery and costumes, however, are tasteful and elegant theatre, can scarcely fail to become popular

THE SEARCH FOR SIR JOHN FRANKLIN.

The deposition of Capt. Martin, master of Prince Regent, on the 30th ult., before the Privy Council, has been published, fully confirming the statement of Captain Penny, given in the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS of December 27th, as to the conversation between Captain Martin and Sir John Franklin in fat. 75.10, long. 66 W., on the 28 h of July, 1845, the Erebus and Terror being in company. "The conversation," states the deposition, "lasted all the time the ships were close. (Captain Martin was then master of the whaling-ship Intrepid.) That Sir John, in answer to a question by the deponent if he had a good supply of provisions, and how long he expected them to last, stated that he had provisions for five years, and if it were necessary he could make them up to seven years, and he said, further, that he would use no opportunity of killing bears, and whatever else was useful that came in the way, to keep up their stock, and that he had plenty of powder and shot for the purpose. That Sir John also stated that he had already got several casks of birds salted, and had two or three shooting parties out—one from each ship. The birds were very numerous; many would fall at a single shot, and the deponent has himself killed forty at a shot with white peas. That the birds are very agreeable food, are in taste and appearance similar to young pigeons, and are called by the sailors 'roches.' That on the 26th or 28th of the said month of July two parties of Sir John's officers, who had been out shooting, dined with the deponent on board the Enterprise. There was a boat with six from each ship. Their conversation was to the same effect as Sir John's. They spoke of expecting to be absent four or five, or perhaps six, years. These officers also said that the ships would not return where they could fin l a convenient place, and in spring push on as far as possible, and so on year after year, as the determination was to push on as far as practicable. That on the following day such determination was brought to the deponent, verbally, to dine with Sir John, but the wind sprung up, and the Enterprise having cut through the ice about a mile and a half, the deponent was obliged to decline the invitation. That he saw the Erebus and Terror for two days longer; they were still lying at an iceberg, and the Enterprise was moving slowly down the country. That no numerous were the birds mentioned, and so favourable was the weather for shooting there, that a considerable number must have been secured during the time the deponent was in sight of the two ships. The deponent has himself had a supply of the same description of birds, which kept fresh and good during three months, at Davis' Straits, and the last was as good as the first of them."

THE SIBERIAN EXPEDITION.—We regret to learn, from a letter of Sir R. Murchison, that the Russian Government, after having patiently considered and matured the plan to traverse Siberia, to the north-eastern extremity, and thence to endeavour to reach the mountainous lands far to the north of Behring's Straits, has come to the conclusion that the gal ant Lieutenant, to whom were entrusted so many instrumentable observations, and the Expedition not consent to allow the life of a British officer to be perilled in vain; but being desirous of doing everything possible to aid the search for Sir John Franklin, the Government had placed Lieutenant Pim in communication with Mr. Rae and Mr. Maddendorf the one the explorer of Nova Zembla, and the other of Northern and Eastern Siberia, in the hope that by some other plan additional chances might be afforded of saving the gallant crews of the ill-fated ships. The replies have, from the beginning, cordially co-operated everywhere with the British, in the As at c or American Arctic possessions of Russia. Sir Roderick Murchison urges the search on the Behring Strait, to which the promotion of Mr. Rearson's project to penetrate to the north of Behring's Straits in a small screw steamer. Sir R. Murchison refers to the fact that the out of six Russian seamen were rescued after passing seven years of six years in the frozen Arctic region of Spitzbergen, where they found abundance of animal food, as a reason for the despair of Frank in and his crew until every means of rescue had been exhausted. Mr. Rae has the purchased his vessel, which is now strengthening in dock. His first object will be to visit New Siberia, north-east of Behring's Straits, which would have been the ultimate resort of Lieut Pim, had he succeeded in reaching the coasts of the mainland to the south of it.

THE ROYAL OBSERVATORY AND ELECTRIC TELEGRAPH.—Arrangements are now being made, with the consent of the South-Eastern Railway Company, and at the request of the Astronomer Royal, for placing the Royal Observatory at Greenwich, in connexion with the wires of the Electric Telegraph Company, which will give facilities for instantaneous astronomical observations at noon and the same time in all parts of the kingdom, and by means of the submarine telegraph with nearly all parts of the Continent. Two other advantages will also be obtained; viz those of ascertaining the difference in the longitudes of places, and of regulating the national time by the uniform standard of Greenwich.

THE SULTAN AT A ROMAN CATHOLIC MARRIAGE.—The Courrier de Marseilles, on the authority of a letter from Constantinople, dated December 17, states that the great piece of news there is, that the Sultan has attended the ceremonies of the marriage secord by the rites of the Roman Catholic Church between the son of M. [illegible], and the daughter of the Prince of E——. The report had long been spread that the Sultan intended to be present at this ceremony, but no one will believe that he would so unprecedented a step could take place. The sol an, however, arrived at the nuptial mansion without ceremony, escorted by two horsemen only, and followed by a few coursiers. He was received with gratitude by the clergy and the family of the bride and bridegroom A throne was prepared for him, and after he has taken coffee and smoked the sacramental pipe he remained ceremonied. His Majesty stood up the whole time, saying that he could not hear the name of Jesus pronounced upon in any other post on.

THE BUREAUCRACY OF FRANCE.—The Presse gives, from an official return, the following list of agents and functionaries of all kinds attached to the departments in France: Justice, 11,100; Foreign Affairs, 600; Public Instruction, 50,000; Interior, 344,000; Public Works, 30,000; War, 30,000; Marine, 3,000; Finance, 70,000 Total, 534 832. In the 11,100 agents and employés of the Department of Justice are not included 6000 agents and members of the Legion of Honour paid by the budget of that establishment. Out of the 344 000 of the Department of the Interior, the agents paid by the communes count for 300,000, and the 10 000 employés of public works are independent of 15,000 men employed in the repair of the roads.

CHRISTMAS IN THE CITY.

On Tuesday, December 30th, in the parish of St. Martin Vintry, which is united to that of St. Michael Cellge-hill, famous for the college abode of Dunstan, and Richard Whittington (alth ugh, strange to say, no monument or memorial in the present church tells of that industrious pair), the pleasure of witnessing an exceeding pretty and most satisfactory Christmas feast; its principal feat having been the entertainment of the children who are being educated on the eleemosynary and religious foundation of the Vintry Ward School, instituted A. D. 1710, the house of which afforded excellent accommodation for the festive doings. The Rector, the Rev. Thomas Darling, presided directing the lancement and good old sports of Christmastide; and there was a numerous company of visitors.

Before describing the entertainment itself, we would remark upon the very tasteful and appropriate ornamental in of the rooms chiefly the work of the scholars themselves, the beautiful evergreens with which they were decked being, a portion of a present from T. Cubitt, Esq., of Clapton, and the Rector, with the greater part of which the church had been beautified. On the walls were hung a plentiful supply of maps and prints from Holy Scriptures, besides framed engravings, including Ov rbeck's "Saviour in the Temple," and two of Holloway's set of Hap s To Cartoons.

The proceedings were started with a carol, the opening verse of which ran thus:—"Christmas comes, the time of gladness;" Mrs. Plummer, organist of the parish, playing a second and harmonium, the property of the school. This was succeeded by another carol, commencing "From the hallowed holy tower." These finished, the whole party resumed upon the forms, and, as usual, also hung with maps and prints; and presently were displayed before the children a sumptuous feast in the shape of a magnificent

Down again came they to the tables, and the real business of punch and fun; the distribution of which afforded much scope for mirth-stirring. The next step consisted in singing the vesper hymn, "Hark! the evening comes on seating," and another evening hymn from an old-fashioned work, called "Hymns for Little Children."

After this, was carried from its resting-place in the window corner, where it is regarded in our Engraving, a Christmas-tree, a fine tree, in its way, of its dimensions, considering, with limits. Having been transplanted to the spot last which was suspended a little chandelier, it was in due time, and quickly accorded by the hands of the choice little girls, to the great delight of the children seated in one direction the boys, in the other the females under the pupils. The German waltz-tune song was forthwith struck up, and altogether, considering was the fact, a capital one it was with the whole party for a short time. Then came the period for packing the productions, cracknels, cakes, and books, and first-rate in every which were dispersed by the rather into the hand of the youngest in the school, a child three or four years old

One of the most pleasing features of this festival was the presence of some sixteen old scholars, eleven of whom were girls. These, during the period of all of our readers and interlocutors, to whom, in some cases, the Rector had written, requesting leave for them, were most considerately received for a few hours to take some of their early schoolroom. It can scarcely have failed but that, by this bringing together the present and past well-conducted pupils, the occasion have been beneficial y reminded of all the good lessons they have received on that spot; and the other have been encouraged by the pleasure of their old schoolfellows, to fit themselves for being, in like manner, good and trustful servants.

Well, then, of these former scholars, a call was made for such girls as, having left school since June, 1850, had continued a year, or nearly so, in their places, when there stood forth three—the only three who, by length of absence, could have fulfilled the conditions—to each of whom was presented a packet of books. Afterwards, the oldest scholar in the room was summoned; upon which advanced, with firm and steady step, one declaring herself to be 77—Mary Rignall, mother of the schoolmistress; and, no one putting in a higher claim, she carried off the book intended for such an one. A second distribution of buns and cake now came out, and was speedily exhausted. The closing scene soon followed.

The whole was terminated by singing another carol, "Once in Royal David's city;" and, as a farewell address to all, the latter verses of the one with which the rejoicings had been opened—

I say to all this hal owed season,
Cheerful marks the closing day.

At ten o'clock the sad hour for parting arrived. Notice was given to quit; and never was such a notice much more reluctantly received. Now for the first moment did the looks of the children betray something like grief: grief to think that their thankful, happy evening was come to an end, and that all must now separate—old and young, past scholars and present, rich and poor, the children of the one and the children of the other; master and servant, minister and people, and patiently, but not without that sweet remembrance of the feast day, wait the coming of another Christmas.

We cannot conclude without giving our hearty assent to a remark which was dropped by one of the strangers present—that the singing was very different from that which is usual in our charity-schools, being of a much higher character, though at the same time simple and unpretending, and all in unison.

SPORTING JUMP OF TWENTY-SIX FEET.

This extraordinary jump of 26 feet was made, a few days since, in cool blood, by a bay mare, at Kensal-green, carrying upwards of 12 stone, over one of the sewers which runs under the canal, 500 yards from the gas factory, about 10 feet deep and 20 feet wide.

On Monday week Colonel ——, who wanted a steeple-chase jumper, came out to look at the mare, and our Correspondent had provided a cord about 25 feet long, intending to ride at this fence, and thus to measure the distance the mare would go over it. The Colonel, however, thought the dyke one of the ugliest things he had ever seen; adding, that he should be content with a trial over a much smaller fence. However, our Correspondent had resolved upon the longer leap. The mare having to gallop up a hill to the fence, could not see what was before her until she came very near it; and, according, did not measure her distance properly: she therefore took off six feet from the edge, and reached the opposite bank without any mistake, clearing a distance of 26 feet in a straight line; and, if the rise and fall be added, they would make the actual distance travelled in the air considerably more than 30 feet. The Colonel, on measuring the jump, found the string more than a foot too short. It has been since measured with a rule, and ascertained to be 24 feet 10½ inches, which, with 1 foot 1½ inches, the quantity it wanted of the correct measure, makes exactly 26 feet.

The mare is Irish bred; about 15¼ hands high; nearly thoroughbred; with remarkably strong legs. She was bred by Mr. F. P——, of Clonsilla, county Dublin, and is six years old: her sire is Tearaway.

In the accompanying Illustration the jump appears in the foreground, the banks being sloped down to the bottom of the dyke. The gateway to the left and the trees are in Kensal-green Cemetery. In the centre are the parsonage and church, the canal-bridge and gas-factory appearing in the corner to the right.

The leap itself is situated on level ground; but the side from which the mare jumped very soon begins to slope down into a hollow, so that she had to gallop up hill to the fence.

The measure was taken from hind-feet to hind-feet.

PORTRAIT OF A GENTLEMAN, BY VAN EYCK.

We this week present our readers with another of the recent additions to the National Gallery. It is a small picture painted on panel, whose antique frame (probably that in which it was originally placed) informs us that it was "done" by Jan de Eyck, 21st October, 1433, A.D. No authentic information is possessed as to whom it represents; some have given it the name of Hubert Van Eyck, the elder brother and instructor of John. Hubert, however, died seven years before the date which this picture bears. The portraits of him, moreover, bear little resemblance to it. Be this as it may, it is a work of unquestionable excellence, and as favourable a specimen of the master as could be desired. While it is pencilled with all the minuteness and delicate finish for which he was famous, the head is by no means deficient in breadth, the flesh is agreeably and truthfully coloured, and the scarlet turban subordinated in tone with great skill. Nor should our admiration be lessened when we consider that this picture was among the earliest painted in oil. Vasari gives to John Van Eyck the honour of inventing that method of painting. It has been found, however, that the process of preparing colours with oil was known long before. Still, as Van Eyck had, in the course of his experiments, himself discovered the value of linseed or walnut oil in painting, and brought it to such a state of practical perfection that it henceforth came into ordinary use, his title to the praise of discovery is just as good as that of most inventors. Vasari further asserts that, about 1410, Anthony of Messina, having seen a picture painted in oil by John Van Eyck, which had been sent to Alphonsus I, King of Naples, went to learn the secret of him, and employed it in founding the Venetian school of painting. The method of the Fleming was speedily adopted in preference to every other process already in use. The chemical knowledge brought to bear on the mechanism of the art, and the careful discrimination in the employment of colours, have made oil and canvas, in the hands of Van Eyck and his successors, little less durable than the marble of Phidias and Praxiteles. For this inestimable boon, art is principally indebted to the painter of Bruges.

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND

LUMLEY CASTLE, DURHAM.

Lumley, the seat of the ancient family founded by Liulph, an eminent Saxon, in the reign of Edward the Confessor, was erected into a castle by Sir Richard Lumley, who obtained a licence to that end in 1389; but the body of the edifice was built in the reign of Edward I. At the east entrance are the armorial bearings of the family on six shields carved in stone on the face of a gallery over the gate. The motto of the family is "Murus aeneus conscientia sana." The castle is disposed in a quadrangular form, surrounding an open court, and is situated in the township of Little Lumley, on a commanding eminence, about a mile east of Chester-le-Street, on the banks of the river Wear, being, from its situation and dimensions, a conspicuous and noble object, visible from a great distance.

The finest feature is the east front, shown in the accompanying Engraving, which retains all its original antique character. Other parts of the building have suffered from innovation, and the south front is entirely modern. The eastern side of the castle is exceedingly picturesque, rising from a wooded valley, through which flows a stream called Lumley Beck, a tributary of the Wear.

LUMLEY CASTLE.

The great hall of the Castle is celebrated for its dimensions, being ninety feet long, and of proportionate width: it is furnished with minstrel gallery, and the walls are decorated with numerous trophies, together with a series of ideal portraits representing the heads of this ancient house from the Saxons downwards. The principal entrance to the Castle is now in the east front, where the edifice is based on a terrace ranging between the flanking towers, and approached by a double flight of steps.

In the fine view which is obtained from the windows the beautiful spire of the church of St Mary and St. Cuthbert, Chester-le-Street, is a conspicuous object. This church is the burial-place of the Lumleys; their tombs, bearing recumbent effigies, extend the whole length of one of the aisles.

Lumley Castle was one of the places where James I. rested when proceeding south to take possession of the English crown; and it is recorded that his host, entertaining him with a lengthy dissertation on the genealogical honours of the house of Lumley, had traced them back beyond the measure of the King's patience, and was proceeding with "and the head of this branch was Adam de Lumley," when his Royal guest cut him short, crying, "Oh, man, hand yer hand; let me digest this knowledge I ha' gained; for by my saul I did no ken that Adam was a Lumley."

Royal Institution.—Last Saturday Professor Faraday delivered, in Albemarle street Institution, the third of a series of lectures to a juvenile audience and many adults, on attractive forces. The lecturer illustrated the peculiarities of electricity, and the attraction produced by it. He first tested its excitement to a high degree by friction in bodies, such as glass, with wax, resin, and then showed its entire removal by passing the hand over the bodies, the whole occurring without any change in the other properties. He next demonstrated the attraction at a distance, and afterwards dwelt upon the equally powerful repulsions, and the considerations which suggested the idea of two kinds of electricity. He then proceeded to illustrate the transference of the power from place to place by conduction and also by conduction, and the apparent independence of the power as respected matter shown. He next called attention to the peculiarity of light and heat produced by electricity in its transmission across bad conductors; and offered, in conclusion, some observations to prove that its presence was universal. The lecture was illustrated by a variety of interesting experiments.

THE LATE J. W. M. TURNER, R.A.

In our memoir of the great landscape-painter, in the Illustrated London News of December 27, we noticed his humble origin, which we now confirm by a view of his birth-place, the house No. 26, Maiden-lane, Covent-garden, on the north side of the lane, at the corner of Hand-court. The painter was born in the room immediately over the shop of his father, William Turner, who "dressed wigs, shaved beards, and in the days of queues, top-knots, and hair-powder, waited on the gentlemen of the Garden at their own houses, and made money by his trade, then a more flourishing profession than that of a barber of the present day."—Athenæum. The neighbourhood was celebrated for perruquiers' shops, of much greater pretension than William Turner's, one of the class exists to this day in Tavistock-street; and in another shop of the kind in Henrietta-street, a few years since, we heard many a reminiscence of the days when Covent-garden was a fashionable quarter of the town, and its streets were crowded with carriages at the afternoon shopping hours. To return to Maiden-lane. The day of Turner's birth is not known; but he was christened at the parish church of St. Paul's on the 14th of May, 1775. His coffin-plate bears the age of 79. "The first occasion on which Turner is remembered to have manifested a taste for art is peculiarly characteristic of his love of resplendent colours. One day, when a little boy, he accompanied his father to see him dress a gentleman's hair. It happened that an emblazoned drawing of a coat of arms was on the table; and young Turner's fancy being impressed with the design, a short time after their return home his father found that he had made a spirited sketch of a lion that formed part of it. Turner upon this took to drawing, and his first ambition was, not to copy, but to go into the fields and make sketches. A son of Stothard, now living, perfectly remembers his father relating to him that in early life he went one day to Turner's shop, in Maiden-lane, to get his hair cut, when the barber remarked to him in conversation, 'My son is going to be a painter.'"—Literary Gazette. About this time he fell in with Girtin, who, with young Turner, was employed, as boys, to colour prints for Mr John R. Smith, of Maiden-lane, a mezzotinto engraver and portrait painter in crayon.

Turner was an exhibitor at the Royal Academy Exhibition in his fifteenth year, the catalogue for 1790 recording the appearance of "A View of the Archbishop's Palace at Lambeth," the artist being described as "J. W. Turner, living in Maiden-lane, Covent-garden." After working assiduously as an Academy student for five years, in his father's house Turner removed to apartments of his own in Hand-court, for five years more, during which decennial period he exhibited at the Academy no fewer than fifty-nine pictures; and in 1800 was elected an Associate, when he removed to 64, Harley-street.

Maiden lane has other notabilities besides the birth-place of Turner. Archbishop Sancroft resided in the lane, both when Dean of York and Dean of St. Paul's. Andrew Marvell dates one of his letters to his Hull constituents from his lodgings in Maiden-lane, April 21, 1677. Here he was lodging when Charles II. sent Marvell's old schoolfellow, the Lord Treasurer Danby, to renew his acquaintance with him in his [illegible]t. At parting the Lord Treasurer slipped into his hand an order upon the Treasury for £1000, and then went to his chariot. The sequel will be remembered. how Marvell called after the Treasurer; how they both went up again to the garret; and Marvell, after showing that he had a mutton bladebone for a meal, said to Danby, "Andrew Marvell's dinner is provided; there's your piece of paper—I want it not. I know the sort of kindness you intended. I live here to serve my constituents. The Ministry may seek men for their purpose—I am not one." Yet, as soon as the Treasurer had left the house, Marvell sent to borrow a guinea of a friend.

Voltaire, when in England, had lodgings at "The White Peruke," in Maiden-lane.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

GOVERNMENT SCHOOL OF MINES AND MUSEUM OF PRACTICAL GEOLOGY.—On Tuesday A. C. Ramsay, Esq., delivered the first of a series of Geological and introductory lectures of the session of 1851–52. The object of the lecture was geology. The lecturer traced the early development of the science from the works of Frascatoro, Leonardo da Vinci, Steno, Scilla, More, Donati, and Gesnerus of Italy; of Palissy and Marsilli in France; of Hooke and Pachsel in Germany; of Woodward, Ray, Hook, Strachey, and Mitchel in England, down to the present period. He referred to the removal of prejudice against geological investigation, and to the stimulus they had received from the grand generalisations of Werner, Hutton, Cuvier, and Smith. Now, no single mind could grapple with all the details of the numerous branches, of which the chief were physical geology and palæontology—the latter dealing with the formation of rocks, the nature of subterranean heat, the disturbances in the configuration of land and water; and the latter treating of the history of the old life of the world. It was William Smith, continued the lecturer, who first observed a very high eulogy, who clearly enunciated the doctrine of the characteristics of masses of superimposed strata by distinct groups of fossils, by means of which the geologist was enabled to identify groups of strata, though broad oceans rolled between. Mr. Ramsay dwelt on the controversy between the followers of Werner and the more philosophical disciples of Hutton, and on the important results arising from Smith's discovery. He showed how many years would have been wasted in empirical mining proceedings. He enquired the labours of Sir H. de la Beche, as director-general in the geological survey of Great Britain, and announced that the same survey, which the lecturer had since been extended to Ireland, under the direction of Mr. Beete Jukes; he, the lecturer, having the survey of England and Scotland. The broadest and clearest coal-field in Great Britain was that of South Wales, according to Mr. Murchison, who added that, when the present coal-fields were worked out, the question would arise at what depths beneath the unconformable covering that shrouds them will coal-bearing strata be found in workable circumstances—an important problem, which the work they were engaged upon would go far to solve. The nature of Artesian wells was explained by the lecturer; and M. Mulet's borings at Grenelle cited, to prove the immense importance of geological principles which were so connected with the more graceful arts that adorn and elevate society: the lecturer-painter might derive infinite instruction from the study of geology. A sketch of the progress of theory was given, and a study in the British Isles more prominent men had been produced as geologists than in all Europe; but the revelations were only beginning, and to study it we should learn. On Wednesday, Warrington W. Smyth, Esq., of Cambridge, delivered a lecture, "An extended knowledge of mineralogy, and the process of mining, essential to the interests of all engaged in mining operations."

NATIONAL SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.—The Prime Minister received a deputation from this association on Saturday, at his residence in Downing-street, with the National Public School Association: Right Hon. T. M. Gibson, M.P., W. J. Fox, Esq., M.P.; Thos. Bazley, Esq., President of the Manchester Chamber of Commerce; Rev. Commissioner for Education, Rev. R. W. Philips; Rev. Dr. Hall; Assalon Watkin, Esq., J.P.; Sals Schwabe, Esq., and Philip Lucas, Esq., Mr. Chester; Wilson Rayner Wood, Esq., Deputy Lieutenant of the county of Lancaster; Rev. W. F. Walker, M.A., Incumbent of St. James's, Gloucester; Rev. S. Davidson, D.D., LL.D., Professor of Biblical Criticism, Lancashire Independent College; Rev. William M'Kerrow, D.D., and Rev. J. R. Beard, D.D., Manchester; Rev. J. A. Bevan, M.A., Nottingham; Edward Strutt, Esq., A.S.A. Appeal, Esq., and J. A. Read, Esq., London; J. A. Picton, Esq., Liverpool; and Mr. R. W. Smiles Secretary. Mr. T. M. Gibson, in introducing the deputation, explained that it included members of various religious denominations, who had established to promote a better system of national instruction than that which, unhappily, now existed, by carrying through Parliament a bill for a general system of purely secular instruction. It was not intended that it should be carried out by a plan to enable the secular part of the education to be put first of but real instruction that it might be sustained by a rate, rather than by voluntary distribution. Mr. Bazley, Dr. M'Kerrow, the Rev. W. F. Walker, Mr. W. E. Wood, Dr. Davidson, and Mr. Fox entered into details of the proposed plan, which the opinion of the country was rapidly approving. It had become imperative to remove the lamentable ignorance of the country by the introduction of a national system. Lord John Russell, in the absence of pressure on, and Mr. Aspinall, a member of the Society of Friends, fully concurred with the proposition, the latter objecting strongly to the principle that religious instruction should be paid out of the public purse, and the former declaring that the Jews were quite prepared to accept secular education. Mr. Wood mentioned that the measure was entirely in accordance with the principles to which the Marquis of Lansdowne gave his adhesion in the House of Lords. He said that the plan was almost identical with that which had received the Government sanction in Ireland. Lord John Russell, in reply to the remarks of the deputation, said that he was extremely indebted to the country for the zeal and effort in behalf of education. The state of which in this country he had long felt was such as they had no reason to be proud of—indeed, they had reason to be ashamed of it. The Government had, however, not come to any decision in the subject, and had no further to say than as the subject was under consideration. The case of a great scheme of national education to be undertaken by the Government required deep consideration. The Prime Minister then referred to the proceedings of Lord Ashley, Sir R. Peel, who had left the House, and Sir Robert Inglis, who had originally introduced the measure, and who had been in favour of it. He thought the question was approaching a solution, but it was not yet ripe, as it was also Lord Lansdowne's opinion, for Government to interfere. There existed in the public mind a feeling of the necessity of providing religious education, as exemplified in the proceedings of the British and foreign School Society, the National Society, the Wesleyan schools, and the Congregationalists. It was by no means that the general feeling of the country was to combine freely with religious instruction. Committees as one was with the British and foreign Society, he might be prejudiced, but such was his opinion and not Lord John that the best scheme for Ireland would be found to be that by the country. It was very encouraging, however, that the great body of ratepayers were willing to be taxed for education. He did not pledge himself to any particular course, but he hoped that the question would be settled in a few years, and would not be done. Although Sir J. Graham's measure had failed, and produced a great deal of clamour, it was not productive of large and beneficial results. He did not hold that there was any difficulty in the case of religious instruction. His opinion was, that if the country were to say that it must be secular instruction alone, so far from that being hostile to religion, it would only make the religious element capable of understanding the mischiefs of sectarianism and the great truths, the love of God and of our neighbours, and the moral duties which, although not the Christian religion themselves, yet were important portions of it, and their inculcation prepared the mind for its reception. In any of others the plan had not yet ripened to maturity, therefore, as saying there was any hostility between secular and religious instruction. He heard regretted that plan did not necessarily exclude the Bible; it was left for the local committees to decide; petitions with signatures of 50,000 per cent were in favour of the plan. The conference then ended.

THE MASTER ENGINEERS AND THE AMALGAMATED SOCIETY.—This day (saturday), the Mansion House was crowded to excess by a numerous assemblage of the proceedings of this Amalgamated Society, in behalf of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS of last week. About 25,000 members of the trade are now out of employment, and the monthly average of boiler-makers, brass-moulders, coppersmiths painters, turners, unskilled labourers, and apprentices, it is calculated that 20,000 persons have been affected by the resolve of the masters, of whom amongst Lancashire alone there are 10,000. The meeting, it was resolved, that Saturday, and received not to return to their labour after this day without being compensated for the loss of time from this date. A meeting also of the executive committee of the Amalgamated Society, at which it was resolved, "That, inasmuch as the Society has not given its sanction to the work for the public, six members of the Amalgamated society decline to and cause the operations and to advertise to the same effect to the newspapers." NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

NAVAL STORES PUTRID PROVISIONS

During the last and the present week a discovery has been made real ive to the state of the preserved meat for the use of the navy stored at Portsmouth, which has created quite a sen sation, not only in naval circles, but with the public also, as it proves that there is great mismanagement, if not worse, of duty, or dishonesty somewhere. The consequences of such frauds as the examination disclosed cannot be too seriously estimated; and it is very natural y pu, as a case in point, suppose Sir John Franklin and his party to have been supp lied with such food as that condemned, and relying upon it as their mainstay in time of need, the very means furnished for saving their lives may have bred a pestilence or famine among them, and been their destruction.

The examination was commenced on Tuesday week, and was conducted by a board of examination, consisting of Mr. John Davies, R.N., master-attendant of the Royal Clarence Victua ling Establishment, Gosport; Mr. Joseph Pinhorn, R.N., victualling store-keeper; and Lieutenant M'Phail, acting-lieutenant of the receiver of the Royal Naval Hospital, Haslar. The examination has disclosed some horrible facts The ca ses containing the meat are upon the average about 10 lb. canisters In Monday 643 of them were opened, and of which number no fewer than 573 were condemned, their contents being in a state of putrefaction. On Wed nesday two canisters were opened, out of which number 241 were condemned. On Thursday 494 canisters were passed, 6 it of which 459 were condemned This, out of 2707 canisters of meat opened, only 287 have proved fit for human food, these consisted for the most part containing such substances as pieces of cart, rod and tongue, heads of palates, pieces of long ous, coagula ed blood, pieces of liver, ligaments of the throat, pieces of intestines—in short, carbage and putridity in a horrible state, the stench arising from which is most sickening and the sight revolting. The examining board and party were compelled to use prolase y ar W Burnet, disinfecting, lid to keep off, or in the hope of keeping off, pestilence. On Friday, however, they deemed it prudent to desist from the task, as sure for a time, from apprehended danger. Some 700 canisters were in readiness for examination at the commencement. This stuff was supplied to the Admiralty and delivered into store at the time, and is part last November or twelve months, warranted equal to any supplied to Sir John's Arctic Expedition, and to be fair five years. We are informed it came from Gelatt, in Mo davia. The canisters containing meat fit for human beings to eat have been distributed, under the direction of Captain Superintendent Parry, to be deserving poor in the neighbourhood, and those containing the putrid stock have been conveyed to Spithead in lighters and thrown overboard.

On Monday we were, the board of examination resumed their labours, when the result discovered worse matter than even had been brought to light during last week's examination. Of 49 canisters opened on that day, 437 were condemned, a fourth or more, in point of number, being fit for use. Tuesday and 54, being considered good enough to pass, were distributed to the poor of the port. Tea had were thrown over-board at Spithead. The investigating board left off rather early, owing to a headache of Mr. Burnet.

On Thursday the board resumed their nauseous task of examination as long as the effluvium emitted from the canisters was endurable, but they said it a short time to give up the unwholesome work, not having the means to carry investigations of the very efficient cash owing solution of Dr. Sir William Burnett, the Director-Gen ral of the Medical Department of the Navy. During the day they opened 457 canisters, varying in the amount of their contents from 5lb to 10lb each. Out of which were condemned and thrown overboard at spithead, and 31 only considered fit to let pass for distribution amongst the poor. On Wednesday, out of 300 as later, of the respective size of 10 lb., 15 lb., 10 lb., and 11 lb. each, only one was suffered to pass as consumable. Let the reader understand that only brought to bear some item of disgust in the matter of the co mmodity seased up as "preserved meat," such as clots of hair, a piece of intestine with the manure in it, a large lump of gangrenous kidney, and other abominations. On the other days of the week the remaining cases, 26.0 in number, were examined with like result.

In the course of the week Dr Twynam, an experimental agriculturist, applied to purchase a quantity of the offal condemned, with the view of its forming the basis of an artificial manure, but his application was not granted; one was recommended by the authorities to make his application to the Lords of the Admiralty.

DISTILLED WATER AT SEA.—On Tuesday, at Portsmouth, Mr. Davies, the Master-Attendant of the Royal Clarence Victualling establishment, Gosport, superintended the completion of the fitting of Gratt's apparatus for distilling salt water for the Simoom iron troop steam s hip, which is now coaling for a long cruise. This ga ey cooks and distil s the gallon of fresh aerated water from salt water (sea water) for 1000 men. Such an acquisition to the ships of war, whether steam or sailing vessels, cannot be too highly estimated.

DOUBLE-BARRELLED RIFLE CARABINES FOR THE CAPE.—Three hundred and fifty double-barrelled rifle carabines have been shipped in the Barosheed steam troop-ship for conveyance to the Cape of Good Hope. These rifle carabines are for the use of the 12th Lancers. The bulk of the regiment is at the Cape of Good Hope.

MOVEMENTS OF TROOPS.—The 1st battalion Rifle Brigade (service companies) having embarked on Friday week, at Dover, on board the Megæra, for the Cape of Good Hope, the following movements of depôts have in consequence taken place:—Depôt 1st battalion Rifle Brigade, from Dover barracks, arrived at Walmer 3rd January; depôt 90th Regiment, from Walmer, arrived at Dover 2nd January; depôt 14th Regiment, from the Isle of Wight, arrived at Dover 3rd January.

RAISED FULL-PAY LIST.—We understand (says the United Service Gazette) a new warrant is about to be issued with reference to the inlpay retirement The number of brevet officers and captains to be raised from 140 instead of 115 The number of full pay captains of 11s 7d. to be raised from 70 to 35; and that of brevet field officers at 13s. 7d., to be increased from 45 to 74. Of the latter class is at present but one vacant.

ROYAL MILITARY ASYLUM, CHELSEA.—The commandantship of this asylum, about to be vacated by Major-General Peter Brown, will, it is understood, be given to Colonel Sade, commanding the 90th Regiment, which will thus cause a vacancy in that corps.

DEATH OF A MILITARY KNIGHT OF WINDSOR.—Mr. Rand, late Q uartermaster of the 43d Regiment, who received the appointment of a Military Knight of Windsor about two years ago, died at the Castle, on the 1st inst. He had been many years in the service, and had received the silver medal with nine clasps.

NAVAL SURGEONS.—By accounts, dated Dec. 26, from the Mediterranean, we are informed of great sickness prevailing among the assistant-surgeons of the Calliope, owing to the arbitrary conduct of Sir William Parker in depriving snndry of them of their cabins, &c.

THE FORTIFICATIONS AT SHEERNESS.—Orders have been given by the gun-commandants and dock-yard instructors from the Horse Guards, to affix the sights and locks on all the sea-battery guns; also to all the guns forming the inner defence zones of the arsenal, citadel, &c.; and the stock with each, affixed to the sighting machine to be removed for the better use of the Royal Artillery commence on Monday next a battery of about 80 guns of heavy calibre on swivel carriages, when coals, if necessar., be directed shawara and consumed in the fires.—Sheerness Gazette.

Measles have broken out on board the Bellerophon, 78, Captain Lord Paulet, and liberty to go on shore is prohibited to her crew. At the above date she had sat two subordinate officers and three boys, labouring under the disease, to Malta Hospital.

THE SUBMARINE TELEGRAPH IN DANGER.—During the heavy gale from the north on Saturday night and Sunday morning, a large, flat sailing schooner, called the Robert, M. Lange master, bound to Calais from Shields, in endeavouring to beat down Channel, was obliged to bring up. The gale increased in severity, and eventually the vessel drifted, when her anchor got hold of what the captain believes to have been the submarine telegraph. She tried hold on for some time, but her chain not having the strength of the electric cable, she lost her anchor and moorings, and went again drifting. The master reported on getting her into the Downs, and on her examination by the agents for the boatmen, she was brought to a secure anchorage. There does not, however, appear to have been any interruption in working the telegraph. A few days, however, will suffice to show whether the cable has been so far damaged as to admit the water to the wire-, which would seriously influence them.

M. Farina, the celebrated manufacturer of eau de Cologne, had three children, to each of whom he gave a fortune of 240,000 francs. His eldest daughter married, in 1837, M. Hancart Peyeam, who had 100,000 francs. In the course of a few years the fortune both of M. Hancart Peyeam and his wife had disappeared. In 1846 Madame Hancart brought an action against her father to allow her certain annuity, and the tribunal condemned him to pay her 4800 francs a year. M. Hancart subsequently demanded that his father-in-law should make him a separate allowance; but M. Farina refused, on the ground that he no longer lived with his wife, that he was addicted to play, and that he was able to provide for himself. The matter was carried before the civil tribunal, and of se being argued was decided in favour of M. Farina. M. Hancart, on Wednesday, appealed to the Court of Appeal against the judgment, but it was confirmed. In the course of the proceedings Hancart's advocate stated that the income of M. Farina is 224,00 francs.

It appears from the official tables of the Board of Trade, issued on Wednesday by order of the House of Commons, that there has been an increase in the quantities of tea entered for home consumption. In the eleven months ended the 5th December, 1849, the quantity was 46,077,639 lb.; in 1850, 47,392,179 lb.; and in 1851, 49,164,193 lb.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

HILARY TERM.—Last Monday, the lists of the arrears of the Common Law Courts for the ensuing Hilary Term, commencing on Monday next, we exhibited. The three courts number only (with the exception of Crown cases) 1,189 cases, principally cases of ordinary trials by jury, in Middlesex. In the Queen's Bench there are two special cases and demurrers, one for arrangement, and 13 for argument. There are seven enlarged rules, two re-trials for the new trial, and 27 for argument, making in all a number of 52. In the Common Pleas the number is only 21, of which four are demurrers, two enlarged rules, 13 for new trial, and one matter stand ng for judgment. In the Court of Exchequer there are 45 matters. In the paper plary paper, 1 a special case for argument, 4; and demurrers for argument, 9. For judgment three matters stand; 28 rules for new trials. The lists present a very satisfactory appearance, and are of a different character from the lists of the Court of Chancery.

THE JUDGESHIP OF THE GLAMORGANSHIRE, BRECONSHIRE, AND RADNORSHIRE COUNTY COURTS The Lord Chancellor has appointed to this onerous and important office Thomas Falconer, Esq., barrister-at-law. The learned judge is a barris er of nearly twelve years' standing, having been called to the bar of the Hon. Society of Lincoln's Inn in February, 1840.

The sittings of the Central Criminal Court, and the January General Quarter Midsummer Sessions, commenced last Monday; the calendar in the former contained the names of 83 prisoners for trial, and in the latter 71, of which 69 were for delivery. In the Old Bailey, Henry Attwood, who was committed by the Judge of the Westminster County Court for perjury in an action for debt, in which Allen was defendant, was convicted. The perjury in the law permitting parties to be witnesses in their own cause was discussed by the counsel for the prosecution and the court, but the Recorder in his summing up to the jury that it was no part of his or their duty to discuss the policy or impolicy of the law as it now stood; the perjury was committed, it must be punished.

On Wednesday, the trial of Richard Moss, one of the detective officers of the metropolitan police, and Henry Attwood, a constable, for wilful and corrupt perjury, in charging two youths, named Pearcate in and Adam, with an assault upon a policeman in Judson's Piccadilly, on the night of Friday, on the 10th of December, took place. The two young men were examined, and swore positively that there was no foundation for the evidence given by Moss and Attwood before Mr Hall, at Bow-street Police-office, and that they had never seen Moss, who resided in the highest character: he had been twelve years in the police. Baron Platt put it to the jury whether the defendants had made a number of false statements, or whether they had committed any wilful perjury, to suppose was the truth. The jury immediately acquitted the two prisoners. The judge, in answer to an appeal from Mr Parry, the counsel for the prosecution, that some strong observations should be made upon the conduct of the young men who acted by any guilty intentions, as the jury must have expressed their opinion that they were perfectly innocent of the charge brought against them.

On Middlesex Grand Jury, before it was determined whether or not to find a presentment depreciating the value of a tithe-rent charge, the Chairman said, "Gentlemen, and surprising that, in the cases where the property stolen did not exceed in value 30s., magistrates might dispose of them summarily. The grand jury threw out the bill against the prisoner, and the jury were thus saved 3 or 4 summary convictions, and 10 men might to have absolute power over the person, character, or liberty of a fellow-subject.

WASTE OF TIME IN COUNTY COURTS

(To the Editor of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.)

SIR, When twenty cases are set down for hearing in a county court in one day, how many of the persons concerned summoned to attend at the earliest hour of the sitting of the court? By that plan scores of people are compelled to waste hours in unnecessary waiting.

Why not summon the first half on the list at nine, and the other half at two o'clock? If the first half of the cases should be over by one, so much the better. The public would have an hour for exercise, and the judge would return to his chambers early with new vigour to a new audience and a new batch of cases. To the public the sum by such a plan would be very great.

Should I present a plaintiff or defendant by requiring him to wait from ten till three or four o'clock? when, by following the suggestion I throw out, half that waste of time would, in 99 cases out of 100, be saved.— Yours, &c., A PLAINTIFF.

THE CRYSTAL PALACE.—A commission has been issued from the Lords of the Treasury to Lord Seymour, Sir Wm. Cubitt, Mr. Donaldson, to inquire and report on the cost of maintaining the building on its present site or its removal elsewhere, either wholly or in part and the purposes to which it could be applied. Evidence will be taken on oath from the contractors and others who have been concerned in the erection.

THE LIBRARIANSHIP OF GRANVILLE.—A letter, which the following explanation, has been addressed by Lord Granville to Mr. Salisbury de Lamoriniere, Librarian of the Athenæum Club:—"I have received your letter from the late Commissioner for the Great Exhibition:—'Monsieur le Commissaire Général.' I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter, and to inform you that I have forwarded it to the Right Hon. the Vice-President of the Committee of Council on Education, and that the purposes to which it relates are entirely foreign to my department. I am, &c., (Signed) GRANVILLE."

THE NATIONAL DEFENCES.

THE threatening position of affairs all over Europe naturally recals attention to the state of the national defences of this country. Every powerful state on the Continent is armed to the teeth; and France, our nearest neighbour, has on foot, ready for immediate service, offensive or defensive, nearly half a million of men. We know of nothing in the sentiments or traditions of the French that should lead the English people to rely with too implicit a confidence on their peaceable intentions towards any of their neighbours, whether strong or weak;—towards England, against whom the grudge of ages, though possibly weakened, is by no means extinct; or towards such neighbours as Belgium, Switzerland, and Prussia, whose territories, or a portion of them, were once considered parts of France. She still avowedly covets these territories, and through the medium of some of her foremost men openly asserts her intention to resume them. While the disposition of no inconsiderable number of the French people is thus menacing, there is nothing in the personal character, or in the public necessities, real or supposed, which may be thought to influence the actions of the unscrupulous and unfeeling tyrant who now wields the supreme power in that unhappy country, to justify us as a nation in placing any reliance either upon his prudence or his honour. If he saw, or thought he saw, that he could strengthen his own position in France by a daring attack upon this country, we may be quite certain that, if our sole defence were in our justice, it would avail us nothing. The man who has been guilty of acts of such astounding despotism as those which we have this week recorded, would not scruple to be guilty even of the wickedness of inventing a pretext for a war of aggrandisement with England, if it suited his purposes best; or with Belgium, Switzerland, Prussia, or Italy, if more were to be gained by it. But the danger does not exist in France alone. The simple truth is, that the whole Continent is one mass of armed tyranny and wrong. Everywhere the most barbarian and barbarous absolutism prevails. Everywhere brute force is the governor of the nations. Everywhere there are multitudinous armies, ready to be let slip by monarchs who have raised, but who scarcely know how to manage them. The personal character of a Sovereign enters but little into the favourable chances for peace, when armies with such aspirations and traditions as those current in France are considered. Louis Napoleon might be as humane and just as he is now proved to be the reverse, without rendering the position of his army a whit less dangerous to the repose of the world. Under these circumstances we may well ask whether it is safe, or politic, or merciful, or even sane, that Great Britain should remain unarmed and defenceless? The most peaceful member of the Peace Society, who bolts his doors at night lest thieves should break in to rob or murder him, acts more zealously on the defensive than the great and wise English people who have no such scruples against war as he has. What no individual in England would consider himself justified in neglecting in his own private defence, the nation as a whole neglects in the most extraordinary manner. As a nation, we are not by any means prepared to prevent an attack of those robbers and murderers on a large scale who declare unjust wars against their neighbours. This country has so long slumbered in security; has looked back with such fond self-complacency at the history of her past triumphs when all the world was leagued against her; has been accustomed so long to think herself inviolable; has attached such glorious reminiscences to the names of her Nelson and her Wellington; and has had such unbounded confidence that future Nelsons and Wellingtons, and fleets and armies to back them, would spring into existence whenever they were required, that she has gone to sleep on the pillow of her glory, and allowed her neighbours to increase their powers of offence without increasing her own means of offence or defence. For many years she has incurred, without a thought, a risk that she ought never to have run. The public mind, however, is now fairly awakened to the importance of the subject. What the warning voice of the illustrious Wellington failed to accomplish in 1847, has been accomplished in 1852 by the reckless acts of the unscrupulous adventurer who has fixed himself upon the neck of France, like the old man of the sea upon the neck of Sinbad the Sailor. For the first time since the peace of Waterloo, the people of England are fully aware of the fact that Europe is not pacified, and that the great work of the last war may have all to be done over again by the living generation. It is openly conceded that England is not in a fit state of defence. By sea and by land we have been equally remiss; and the emphatic letter of the Duke of Wellington to Sir John Burgoyne, which made such a sensation—though, unfortunately, a fruitless one—when it was first published, about five years ago, is still more emphatic and more true at the present time. "You are aware," said the gallant Duke to his correspondent,

"We have for years been sensible of the alteration produced in maritime war and operations by the application of steam to the propelling of ships at sea.

This discovery immediately exposed all parts of the coast of these islands, which a vessel could approach at all, to be approached at all times of the tide, and in all seasons, by vessels so propelled, from all quarters. We are, in fact, assailable.

I have in vain endeavoured to awaken the attention of different Administrations to this state of things, as well known to our neighbours (rivals in power as well as former adversaries and enemies) as it is to ourselves.

I have above, in a few words, represented the danger. We have no choice, no hope of defence, but our fleet. . . .

The whole force employed at home, in Great Britain and Ireland, would not afford a sufficient number of men for the mere defence and occupation, on breaking out of war, of the works constructed for the defence of the dockyards and naval arsenals, without leaving a single man disposable.

As we stand now, and if it be true that the exertions of the fleet alone are not sufficient to provide for our defence, we are not safe for a week after the declaration of war.

I am accustomed to the consideration of these questions, and have examined and reconnoitred, over and over again, the whole coast from the North Foreland, by Dover, Folkestone, Beachy Head, Brighton, Arundel, to Selsey Hill near Portsmouth; and I say, that, excepting immediately under the fire of Dover Castle, there is not a spot on the coast on which infantry might not be thrown on shore at any time of the tide, with any wind, and in any weather; and from which such body of infantry so thrown on shore would not find, within the distance of five miles, a road into the interior of the country, through the cliffs, practicable for the march of a body of troops.

But the remonstrance from which we have just quoted has not been made in vain. At the close of his brilliant and useful life, the gallant Duke has it again in his power to be of service to his country; and public opinion, which in England is proverbially so slow to be aroused, always does its business thoroughly when once its lazy indifference has been conquered. This point has been at length attained in the matter of the national defences, and the consequences will be, that every department of our naval and military service will be "overhauled," if not re-modelled, and that we shall not only increase the amount of our land and sea forces, if proved to be necessary, but that we shall turn our existing forces to better account than we have hitherto done. In the art of war, as in the art of trade, Englishmen will act upon the principle of getting the most they can for their money. If it turn out that men in red coats engaged in battle are more likely to be "picked off" than men in blue coats or green ones, we shall abandon the red coat, as military men have suggested. If it be proved that the British soldier is too heavily encumbered on service with arms, baggage, or accoutrements, we shall relieve him of the load. If, on investigation, it be found that our muskets are not capable of the proper execution, or that their construction has not kept pace with the progress of scientific improvement in other countries, we shall discard them, whatever shock we may inflict on the prejudices of men in office, and at whatever present cost to the country. If it be deemed prudent that a militia should be called out, there are energy and patriotism sufficient in the youth of the nation to compose a powerful force. The point of difficulty has been passed. Great Britain will show, though rather late, that she is prepared for all contingencies, and that she is as safe from a sudden surprise as from a deliberate and forewarned attack. She will thus keep all enemies at bay, and preserve herself as inviolable and invincible as she has ever been. With her free institutions, and the indomitable spirit of her people, she may defy all foes, come whence they will; and, by proving herself ready for war, will do infinitely more towards maintaining peace, than by continuing the easy slumber into which her past successes so unfortunately have lulled her.

THE NEW DOCK, SOUTHAMPTON.

We have frequently had occasion to congratulate the inhabitants of Southampton upon the commercial prosperity of their port, attributable to the enterprise and intelligent spirit evinced in the construction of docks and other public works. The Illustration upon the preceding page is gratifying evidence of the latest improvement of the class, it having been opened for the reception of vessels during the past month.

We understand that the breadth of the entrance to the inner dock is sufficiently capacious so admit the largest class of sailing-ships and screw-steamers afloat. The excavations for the Dock (which occupies an extent of ten acres) were commenced in the latter end of March last, and the whole of the works were executed in the short space of eight months. Quay walls are at present built only on the northern and eastern sides; the southern and western consisting of banks or slopes, which it is contemplated to convert into walls at some future occasion. The south side will be merely used at the present for vessels to lay up for repairs, and not for the discharge of cargoes, and temporary platforms will be erected for the purpose of discharging the latter. Quay walls will be constructed on the western quay for the discharge of coal-brigs. The length of the wall on the northern side is 804 feet, and on the eastern (including the entrance) 550 feet; giving a total length of quay room on the north of 750 feet, and on the east of 450 feet. The width of the entrance from the open dock into the new inclosed dock is 46 feet, and after passing through the gates 50 feet. The lowest depth of water in the inner dock, at high water neap tides, will be 21 feet; and at spring tides, 25 feet; so that there will be a great depth of water at all times of the tide. A sluice 20 inches in diameter has been inserted in the south bank, by means of the water in the dock being lowered at any time to meet the height of the tide in the open dock. The entrance is crossed by means of a running bridge, which, upon being opened, disappears beneath a verbarated platform. The bridge has a line of rails, a carriage, and footways for the public. It is very simple in its construction, and is a new and ingenious invention. An extensive warehouse, 200 feet long and 46 feet wide, with two floors, and ample vaults, is being erected on the north side of the inner dock. The tramway connecting the dock premises with the railway is about to be extended to the new dock, and will be laid down so close to the edge of the quay wall as to enable coals to be discharged from the ship's side into the waggons without the additional labour of raising them out. 100,000 yards of excavation were removed in the progress of the works, and about 12,000 tons of Swanage and 8000 tons of Portland stone used in the construction of the wall. The whole cost of the new dock, including the bridge, lock gates, cranes, warehouses, &c., is somewhere about £23,000. The works have been executed under the active superintendence of Alfred Giles, Esq., engineer to the company, and Mr. Robert Grandon, the clerk of the works, to whom the credit is due for the ability and rapidity with which they have been effected. The weekly payment of wages averaged from £400 to £450, a fact which, of itself, shows the great advantages conferred upon the trade of the town by undertakings of this character.

By the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company's ship Iberia, arrived at Southampton on Wednesday, we have been favoured with the following intelligence:

"Alexandria, January 5, 1852.

"During the early part of December very severe weather was experienced in Alexandria; gales of wind, rain, and cold weather lasting for several days, almost without intermission. The French steamer Cairo, after a long passage from Beyrout, unable to enter the harbour, was obliged to put into Aboukir Bay, where she broke her cable and parted her chain, and was obliged to run for the town round to Alexandria. The Brindisi screw-steamer Ava also encountered very severe weather, and after a long passage from Beyrout reached Aboukir, whence she was towed by an Egyptian steamer, having sustained trifling damage to her machinery, which has been since repaired. The Neapolitan war-steamer Sannite arrived here a few days since with the Duke of Leuchtenberg, who is an invalid and travelling for his health. His suite and the Russian consul's house in Alexandria this morning, escorted by several Egyptian officers in full uniform, to embark on the canal for Cairo.

"The Sannite started for Cairo about noon to-day, but soon after got aground, owing to the crowd of shipping now in port, and was got off with difficulty some two hours after by the united efforts of her engines and several boats' crews from the Egyptian fleet. It would seem she had not sustained any damage, as she proceeded at once to sea.

"The Rupon arrived here from England on the night of the 3d of January, but did not enter the port till daybreak on the 4th. She brought 161 passengers from England and Malta, mostly en route to India, besides the mails, cargo, and a large amount of treasure. She encountered severe weather between England and Gibraltar, and prevailing head-winds the whole way to Egypt. She leaves for England this afternoon with 130 passengers, of whom 59 are first class, from India. The Oriental arrived at Suez on the 1st, after a quick passage from Calcutta.

"Expeditionary operations against the mountain tribes of North India, everything was quiet when the mail left.

"A rumour had reached India by the north east frontier from Tartary, that the Emperor of China was dead; nothing of the kind, however, had been spoken of in Canton when this mail started from China.

"The last accounts from Australia, by way of India, state the gold-digging east mine moreluring as before.

"Some of the engineers employed on the Egyptian Railway have been unwell; however, the leveling for this important work is being actively carried on. The weather at Cairo has been very cold lately. A serious affray occurred, some days since, on the Nile, between some American travellers and a great number of Arabs. Several shots were fired, and three or four Arabs are said to have died of their wounds; one was the servant of one of the American gentlemen. The matter, having been laid before the authorities at Cairo, is likely to have origin and in some trifling dispute between the Arab servants of the travelers and the neighbouring villagers; some of the latter were punished.

"While great attention is being paid to the comfort of travellers generally through Egypt, the Alexandria Lavenue for passengers from Syria continues as unhealthy and loathsome as ever."

SHIP COLLISION.—On Tuesday night a serious collision took place near the mouth of the Mersey between the steam-ship Clarence and the ship Gladiator, which has produced much injury to property, but, so far as we have been able to learn, with no personal loss. The Clarence, commanded by Mr. Laird, of Birkenhead, commanded by Captain Wiseman, and now on her first voyage, left Liverpool that morning for Sydney, New South Wales. The weather being fine, the ship Gladiator, from Dantzic, for Liverpool, with timber for Clarence, and carried away her main mast and bulwarks. The steamer was so much injured that she had to return to port, where she arrived ... Tuesday evening. On Wednesday morning, and were sent to Birkenhead Dock ... water for repairs. The Gladiator was also much injured, and leaking.

CIVILISATION IN "THE FAR WEST."—A gentleman recently arrived at Colonia, from the Pialba, gives the editor of the News the following account of a private landing affair that came off on Carson River on the 20th of September by an impromptu vigilance committee: "John Wilson and Green Hems or, two men belonging to a train of emigrants composed of persons from Michigan and Missouri, had some slight difficulty the day before the train arrived at the Fourteen Mile Desert, which amounted merely to words. Some of the company remarked to Wilson that he had better look out, or Hensley would shoot him. Nothing more was thought of the matter till the night they crossed the desert. While the party were preparing their supper, Wilson lay down and went to sleep, when Hensley approached him, drew his pistol, and deliberately shot him. Wilson lingered till about ten o'clock next day, when he expired While the company were engaged in interring the remains of their murdered comrade, a party of Californians, returning to the States, came up, and, on inquiring into and being made acquainted with the circumstances, proposed to have Hensley tried for the murder. Accordingly, a jury was called, the prisoner selecting three, and the emigrants three. After hearing all the circumstances, the jury found him guilty, and sentenced him to be hung immediately. Preparations having been completed, the sentence was at once carried into effect. Hensley was from Missouri. Wilson, we understand, was from Illinois (or ... Michigan."

DEATH.—On the 9th inst., in St. Patrick-square, Edinburgh, at the advanced age of 101 years and 11 months, John Wilson. He was originally a mason-lad, and for many years has been supported by the industry of his daughter. Until the last few months he was able to read and occasionally to walk out by himself.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

Louis Napoleon has at length given to the French nation his new Constitution, which, like the numerous others that have preceded it, is, in the estimation of its author, to be a complete panacea for the evils and distractions which afflict France.

The following is a summary of its principal provisions:

The President is to preserve his present title; he is responsible before the people, to whom he can always appeal. He commands the land and sea forces. He alone has the initiative of the laws; he has a right to declare the state of siege, save the referring of it to the Senate. He presents one message every year. No accusation can be brought against Ministers but by the Senate. They are only responsible for their respective duties.

The functionaries take the oath of obedience to the Constitution and fidelity to the President.

In case of the death of the President, the Senate calls upon the nation for a new election.

The President has a right, by a secret deed, deposited with the Senate, to designate to the people the citizen whom he recommends to the suffrage, until the election of a new President.

The President of the Senate governs jointly with Ministers.

The number of senators not to exceed one hundred and fifty. It is fixed at eighty for the first year.

The senators are named for life by the President. The functions are performed gratuitously. However, the President may grant a salary not exceeding thirty thousand francs.

The sitting of the Senate not to be public. It regulates the constitution of colonies, and all that has not been provided for by the Constitution. It may propose modifications of the Constitution, but any modification of the bases laid in the proclamation of Dec. 2 will be referred to universal suffrage.

There will be a deputy to the legislative body for every thirty-five thousand electors, elected by universal suffrage for ten years, and receiving no emolument.

All adopted amendments to be sent, without discussion, before the Council of State, and cannot be discussed if not equally adopted by this one

The sittings will then last three months.

Reports of the sittings by newspapers will be confined to the official reports of the proceedings drawn up by the bureaux. The President and Vice-President are nominated by the President of the Republic for a year.

Ministers cannot be deputies.

Petitions may be addressed to the Senate, but none to the legislative body.

The President of the Republic convokes, adjourns, prorogues, and dissolves the legislative body.

In case of dissolution, a new one to be convoked within six months.

The Council of State, composed of forty or fifty members, is nominated and presided over by the President, who may revoke its members. They receive an annual salary of 25,000 francs. They draw up the project of laws and discuss them before the Legislature.

There will be a High Court of Justice, without appeal, before which will be tried all attempts against the State or its chief.

The mayors are appointed by the Executive Power.

The promulgation of the Constitution, of which the above form the heads, took place on Thursday. It was preceded by a proclamation dated Wednesday, explaining the spirit in which it was conceived, the principles on which it was based, and the leading provisions of which it was constituted. This remarkable document throws considerable light on Louis Napoleon's views, motives, and intentions at the present moment with respect to the government of France, and is as follows:—

PROCLAMATION OF LOUIS NAPOLEON, PRESIDENT OF THE REPUBLIC, TO THE FRENCH PEOPLE

PROMULGATING THE CONSTITUTION OF THE 2D OF DECEMBER, 1851.

FRENCHMEN!

In my proclamation of the 2d of December, when I loyally explained to you what, according to my ideas, were the vital conditions of government (pouvoir) in France, I had not the pretension, so common in these days, of substituting a personal theory for the experience of centuries. On the contrary, I sought in the past the examples that might best be followed, what men had given them, and what benefits had resulted.

I have thought it reasonable (logique) to prefer the precepts of genius to the specious doctrines of men of abstract ideas. I have taken as models the political constitutions which already, at the commencement of this century, under analogous circumstances, have strengthened tottering society and raised France to a lofty degree of prosperity and grandeur.

I have taken as models those institutions which, instead of vanishing at the first breath of popular agitation, were only overturned by the might of all Europe coalesced against us.

In one word, I said to myself, since France makes progress during the last fifty years, in virtue alone of the administrative, military, judicial, religious, and financial organisation of the Consulate and the Empire, why should not we steadfastly adopt the political institutions of that epoch?

Created by the same thought, they must bear the same character of nationality and practical utility.

In effect, as I recalled to mind in my proclamation, it is essential to aver that our present state of society is nought else than France regenerate by the revolution of '89, and organised by the Emperor. Nothing remains of the old régime but its great memories and great benefits: all that was organised under it was destroyed by the Revolution, and all that since the Revolution has been organised, and that still exists, has been the work of Napoleon.

Of no longer possess provinces, or states, or Parliaments, or intendants, or farmers-general, or certain customs, or feudal rights, or privileges, or classes holding exclusive possession of civil and military employment, or different religious jurisdictions.

To all these changes, so incompatible with its spirit, the Revolution applied a thorough reform; but it founded nothing definitive. The First Consul alone re-established unity, hierarchy, and the true principles of government. They are still in vigour.

Thus, the administration of France entrusted to prefects, sub prefects, and mayors, who substitute unity in the place of directing commissions (the decision of affairs, on the contrary, being confided to councils—from that of the commune to that of the department). Thus, the magistracy, rendered firm by the immovability of the judges, and by the hierarchy of the tribunals—justice rendered more prompt by the clear definition of attributions from those of the justice of the peace, up to those of the Court of Cassation all this is still standing.

In the same manner, our admirable financial system, the Bank of France, the establishment of the budget, the Court of Accounts, the organisation of the police, and our military statutes, date from the above-mentioned epoch.

For the last fifty years it is the Code Napoléon that has adjusted the reciprocal interests of citizens; it is still the concordat that regulates the relations of the State with the Church.

Lastly, the greater portion of the measures which concern the progress of industry, of commerce, of literature, of science, and of the arts, from the statutes of the Théâtre Français to those of the Institute of France—from the institution of "Prud' hommes" to the creation of the Legion of Honour—have been fixed by the decrees of that time.

It may then be affirmed that the frame of our social edifice is the work of the Emperor—which has stood firm—resisting his fall and the shocks of three revolutions.

Wherefore, since they have the same origin, should not his political institutions have the same chances of duration?

My own conviction has been formed for a long time, and therefore it was that I submitted to your judgment the principal bases of a Constitution borrowed from that of the year VIII. Approved of by you, they are to become the foundation of our political Constitution.

Let us now examine its spirit

In our country, for the last eight hundred years, Monarchical—the central—power has always existed by increasing—royalty destroyed the great vassals—the revolutions themselves caused to disappear the obstacles which opposed the rapid and uniform exercise of authority. In this country of contrasts, public opinion has invariably referred everything, good and evil, to the Chief of the Government; so that, to write at the head of the charter that the chief is responsible, is to be (mentir) to public feeling. It is to endeavour to establish a fiction which has three times disappeared at the sound of revolution.

The present Constitution, on the contrary, proclaims that the chief whom you have elected is responsible to you. That he has the right of appeal to your sovereign judgment, in order that in grave (solennelles) circumstances you may always be able to continue your confidence in him, or to withdraw it.

Being responsible, his actions must be free and without hindrance. Hence arises the obligation of his having Ministers who may be the honoured and powerful auxiliaries of his thoughts, but who no longer form a responsible council, composed of jointly responsible members (membres solidaires), a daily obstacle to the special influence of the Chief of the State, a council, the expression of a policy emanating from the Chambers, and for that very reason exposed to frequent changes, which render impossible a continuous policy (esprit de suite) or the application of a regular system.

Nevertheless, in proportion to the loftiness of position in which a man is placed, and, in proportion to his independence and to the confidence that the people place in him, is his need of enlightened and conscientious council. Hence the creation of a Council of State, for the future the real (veritable) Council of the Government, the first work of our new organisation—a reunion, a practical man elaborating projects of law in special committee, then discussing them with closed doors, and without oratorical ostentations, in general assembly, next presenting them to the acceptation of the legislative body.

Thus the Government (pouvoir) is free in its movements, and enlightened in its progress.

Now, what will be the control exercised over the Assemblies?

A Chamber which bears the title of "Legislative Body" votes the laws and the taxes. It is elected by universal suffrage without the ballot (sans scrutin de liste). The people, choosing each candidate singly, can the more easily appreciate his merits.

The Chamber is composed of about 260 members—a first guarantee of the calmness of its deliberations; for too often it has been seen that in assemblies the mobility and ardour of passions increase in proportion to the number of members.

The account of the deliberations which is to inform the nation of its affairs is no longer, as formerly, abandoned to the party spirit of each journal. An official publication, drawn up under the surveillance of the President of the Chamber, will alone be authorised.

The legislative body freely discusses the laws adopts or rejects them—but does not introduce those unforeseen amendments which often derange the whole economy of a system, and the ensemble of the primitive project; and, for still stronger reasons, it does not possess that Parliamentary initiative which was the source of such grave abuse, and which permitted every deputy to substitute himself at every turn in place of the Government, and to present projects, however unstudied or shallow.

The Chamber being no longer in presence of the Ministers, and projects of laws being advocated by the orators of the Council of State, the time will not be lost in vain interpellations, in frivolous accusations, and in passionate struggles, whose sole object was to upset Ministries in order to replace them.

Thus, then, the deliberations of the legislative body will be independent, but the causes of sterile agitations will have been suppressed, and salutary delays introduced into any modification of the laws. The discussions (mandataires) of the nation will maturely accomplish things of importance.

Another assembly bears the name of Senate. It will be composed of those eminent men who in every country create a legitimate influence, such as illustrious name, wealth, talent, and services rendered to the country.

The Senate is not—what the Chamber of Peers was—a pale reflection of the Chamber of Deputies, repeating, in a few days' interval, the same discussions in another tone. It is the depository of the fundamental compact and of the public liberties, compatible with the Constitution, and it is solely with regard to the general principles on which our society is based that it examines all laws, and that it proposes new ones to the Executive power. It intervenes either to resolve any grave difficulty which might arise during the absence of the legislative body, or to explain the text of the Constitution, and to secure whatever may be necessary to its operation (marche). It has the right to annul any illegal or arbitrary act; and thus enjoying the consideration which attaches to a body exclusively occupied with the examination of great interests, or the application of great principles, it is the State the independent, salutary, and conservative office of the ancient Parliaments

The Senate will not be, like the Chamber of Peers, transformed into a court of justice. It will preserve its character of supreme moderator; for disputes always falls on political bodies when the sanctuary of legislation becomes a criminal tribunal. The impartiality of the judges is too often questioned, and it loses all prestige in the public opinion, which sometimes goes so far as to accuse it of being the instrument of passion or of hatred.

A High Court of Justice chosen from among the high magistracy, and having, in jury, members of the Council-General of all France, will alone repress all attempts against the life of the State and the public safety.

The Emperor said to the Council of State, "A Constitution is the work of time. It is impossible to leave in it too large a margin for conjectures." Accordingly, the present Constitution has only settled that which it was impossible to leave uncertain. It has shut up, within insurmountable barriers, the desires of a great people. It has left for change a margin sufficient large to allow, in great crises, of other means of safety than the disastrous expedients of revolution.

The senate can, in concert with the Government, modify all that is not fundamental in the Constitution, but, as to any modifications of the fundamental bases sanctioned by your suffrages, they can only become definitive after having received your ratification.

Thus, the people remains master of its destiny. Nothing fundamental is effected without its will

Such are the ideas, such the principles, that you have authorised me to apply. My Constitution gives to our country calm and prosperous days may it prevent the return of those unfortunate struggles, in which victory, however legitimate, is always dearly bought—may the sanction which you have given to my efforts be blessed by Heaven! Then—PEACE WILL BE MADE AT HOME AND ABROAD, MY ARDENT HOPES WILL BE FULFILLED (mes vœux seront comblés), MY MISSION WILL BE ACCOMPLISHED.

LOUIS NAPOLEON BONAPARTE.

Palace of the Tuileries, January 14, 1852.

Besides the promulgation of the Constitution, the present week has witnessed other measures of a very important character also. The principal of these are, the suppression and re-organisation of the National Guard, and the banishment from the territory of those more either considered likely to thwart the success of the President's schemes, or, on account of their Socialist and extreme democratic doctrines, were regarded as dangerous to the well-being of the State. This latter measure was sanctioned in two decrees, which were published on Saturday last. One of these decrees banishes from the French territory, from Algeria, and from the French colonies, "as a measure of general safety," the following ex-representatives of the Legislative Assembly, and prohibits their return on pain of transportation —

E. Valentin, P. Raconchor, A. Perdignier, C. Cholat, L. Latrade, M. Renaud, J. Benoit (du Rhône), J. Burgard, J. Cofavre, J. Faure (du Rhône), P. Ch. Gambon, C. Lagrange, M. Nadaud, B. Terrier, V. Hugo, Cassal, Signard, Viguier, Charrassin, Bardapet Savoye, Joly, Combier, Boysset, Duche, Emery, Greppo, Michaud, Madier-Montjau, Bruys, Esquiros, Madier-Montjau, N. Parfait, E. Péan, Pelletier, Raspail, T. Bac, Bancel, Belin (Drôme), Besse, Bourzat, Brives, Chanel, Delbrel, Desjardins, Dupont (de Bussac), Faure (Ardon, Lamarque, F. Lefranc, J. Leroux, F. Maigne, Malardier, Matthieu (Drôme), Milotte, Roselli, Moller, Charras, Saint Terréol, Sommier, Testelin (Nord).

These were all members of the Mountain or Red Republican party in the Assembly.

The other decree banishes temporarily from the French territory and from Algeria, as a measure of general safety, the following ex-representatives of the Legislative Assembly, and prohibits their return without the special authorisation of the President of the Republic, penalty, however, being specified for contravention of this decree:—

Duvergier de Hauranne, Criton, General de Lamoricière, General Changarnier, Baze, General le Flo, General Bedeau, Thiers, Chambolle, De Rémusat, J. de Lasteyrie, E. de Girardin, General Laidet, P. Dupras, E. Quinet, A. Chouret, V. Chauffour, Versigny.

There is a third class of the ex-representatives obnoxious to the President, and for whom he has reserved a more dreadful fate, viz, that of transportation to the French colony of Guiana, in South America, within the tropics. The persons condemned to this dreadful penalty are MM. Marc Dufraisse, Greppo, Miot, Mathé, and Richardet.

The Moniteur gives the following justification of this very decisive and arbitrary measure: "The Government," it says,

"Firmly determined to prevent all cause of disturbance, has found it necessary to adopt measures against certain persons whose presence in France might impede the re-establishment of tranquillity. These measures apply to three classes of persons. The first comprises the individuals convicted of having taken part in the recent insurrections. They will, according to their degree of culpability, be transported to French Guiana or Algeria. The second class comprises the acknowledged chiefs of Socialism, whose residence in France would be calculated to foment civil war. They will be expelled from the territory of the Republic, and will be prevented if they return to it. In the third are comprised the political persons who have made themselves remarkable for their violent hostility to the Government, and whose presence might be a cause of agitation. They are to be transported to French Guiana. It is the duty of the Government, under existing circumstances, to repress, but it will know how to keep repression within just limits. The preceding decrees refer to the ex-representatives only. MM. Marc Dufraisse, Greppo, Miot, Mathé, and Richardet will be transported to French Guiana.

Of the expelled representatives, M. Thiers has come to England. General Changarnier and Lamoricière, it is thought, will fix their abode in Belgium; and Emile de Girardin in the United States

The reorganisation of the National Guards is one of the organic laws which Louis Napoleon announced on the morning of the coup d'état was to accompany the new Constitution. This important law was published as a decree on Monday. It is of considerable length, and sets forth the consideration on which it is founded. These are to the effect that order is the only source of work, and is established only in the direct ratio of the strength and authority of the Government. The National Guard ought not to be a guarantee against the executive power, but a guarantee against disorder and insurrection. The principles applied to the organisation of the National Guard at the sequel of different revolutions in France, by indiscriminately arming everybody, were only a preparation of civil war. The composition of the National Guard effected with discernment secures public order and the welfare of the country. In the rural districts especially, where the public force is inconsiderable in number, it is important to provide against every new attempt at disorder and pillage. Recent experience has proved that a single company of good citizens armed for the defence of their homes suffices to keep in check or to put to flight whole bands of malefactors. The changes effected in the constitution of the force are, that, whereas, heretofore, all Frenchmen, with certain exceptions fixed by the law, were National Guards, chose their own officers, and were at the disposal of the municipal authorities of the commune; now the officers are appointed by the President and the prefects, and none are admitted to serve except those chosen by the central authorities. At the same time, this force, which is placed entirely under the control of the Executive, is to be maintained at the charge of the municipalities. An unconditional amnesty is granted to the National Guards for all offences against discipline committed previously to the 13th instant; and, finally, General Lawestine is named Commander-in Chief of the National Guard of the Seine, and M. Vieyra Colonel-in-Chief of the Staff of the same department.

On Tuesday a funeral service was performed at the Church of the Invalides in honour of the late Marshal Soult. The whole of the family of the deceased were present. Admiral de Mackau, Marshals Excelmans and Vaillant, and General de St. Arnaud held the corners of the pall. Among those present were the Minister of Foreign Affairs, the Pope's Nuncio, MM. Guizot, Salvandy, &c.

Louis Napoleon went to the Italian Opera on Tuesday night, and was well received.

The most active and severe measures are taken throughout the provinces against the Socialists, the members of secret societies, and those who took part in the late insurrection. Four hundred and fourteen persons taken from the fort of Jori left Paris on Saturday morning for Havre and Brest, and were thence conveyed to Cayenne (French Guiana). These prisoners arrived in Paris in various detachments from the departments, where they were recognised as having taken an active part in the late insurrectionary movement.

The department of the Hautes Alpes, contiguous to the eighth military division, and lately the scene of insurrection, is declared in a state of siege. In the department of the Basses Alpes no less than 992 individuals were under trial by court-martial for being concerned in the late insurrection. There was not a commune but had its secret society. A decree had been issued by Colonel Fririon, who holds the command of the state of siege, declaring that within three days the property of all those insurgents who had fled should be sequestrated; and that any person found harbouring any such fugitive should be considered as having taken part in the insurrection. The military commissions of Moulins are proceeding actively with their examinations into the cases of the insurgents arrested in the department of the Allier. From Aix we learn that the investigation of the cases of the insurgents of the Var is also proceeding rapidly. It is almost concluded for the arrondissement of Brignoles, where the insurrection was most violent. Not fewer than 2000 insurgents belonging to that arrondissement are in custody.

PRUSSIA.

The grand characteristic of the year 1852 in the annals of the Governments of the Continental nations of Europe would appear to be the re-organisation of political constitutions.

The first week of the present month ushered in the new absolutist order of things in Austria. This week presents an organic change in the Government of Prussia; while in France the alterations which have been promulgated are on the most gigantic scale.

The change effected by the Prussian Sovereign is the restoration, by Royal decree issued on the 13th inst., at Berlin, of the Council of State, of which M. Von Manteuffel is appointed President ad interim.

UNITED STATES.

New York advices of the 1st inst. confirm the telegraphic despatch of last week relative to the fire at the Capitol in Washington.

The Capitol was saved with great difficulty. The occurrence was entirely accidental, arising from a defective flue in the library, which caused the timbers in the wall to ignite. The library of Congress, consisting of 55,000 volumes, was entirely destroyed, together with manuscripts, paintings, and maps, and the loss was estimated at 40,000,000 dols. The original Declaration of Independence was saved. Congress had adjourned for the holidays.

Public and enthusiastic receptions and banquets had been given to Kossuth in Philadelphia and Baltimore. He proceeded thence to Washington, where he arrived on the 30th ult., and was next day presented to the President. The interview was strictly of a private nature, and it was generally understood that Kossuth was disappointed at its result. In Congress no other much opposition, a resolution proposed in the Chamber of Representatives, to give a formal reception to Kossuth in the House, fell to the ground without any decision being come to upon it; while in the Senate the course resolved on was the same as in the case of Lafayette, viz. merely to introduce him as Louis Kossuth, and invite him to take a seat. The public enthusiasm was less warm at Washington than the friends of Kossuth anticipated.

Mr. Henry Clay had formally resigned his seat in the Senate on account of ill health.

The immigration into New York for the year 1851 was 289,600, of which 163,256 were from Ireland, 28,553 from England, and 69,883 from Germany.

A communication had been received by the American Government from the Minister of France, announcing the measures that Louis Napoleon had adopted on the 2d of December for the public safety.

A fire which broke out in New York destroyed 15 houses in Division-street.

From California the accounts are to the 1st of December, and are accompanied by a consignment of 563,000 dollars in gold dust. Further discoveries of gold had been made in Bear Valley, Mariposa County, where it was said seven persons had realised 217,000 dollars in eight days. The United States revenue cutter Lawrence had been wrecked off San Francisco. Business in California is better. Vigilance committees were organised in almost all the interior towns. There had been a movement at Sacramento to ensure the construction of the Great Pacific Railway.

From Canada it is announced that a fire broke out in the barracks at Quebec on the 26th of December, which destroyed military stores to the amount of 40,000 dollars.

INDIA.

Accounts from Calcutta to the 6th and Bombay to the 17th of December have been received. They are not of importance. With respect to the expedition sent under the command of Commodore Lambert to demand satisfaction for certain British claims from the Government of the Burmese Empire, we learn that the force arrived at Rangoon on the 27th of October. The Commodore, after an interview with the Governor, granted a delay of 36 days to obtain from Ava, the capital, compliance with his demands; after which he will proceed to enforce them in case of refusal.

Sir Colin Campbell was still at Michenee, but had engaged in no further battle with the enemy.

By the Directors' orders the greater part of Ali Mourad's territory in Upper Scinde is to be occupied. A division, under General Manson, aided by the Mooltan brigade, will effect these orders. The Aden expedition is abandoned.

Both Mahomed of Caboul, and Maharajah Gholab Singh, were still alive, though it was fully expected that neither could recover.

Mr. Reddie, the First Judge of the Calcutta Court of Small Causes, died on the 28th November, from cholera.

THE RIVER PLATE.

Advices from Monte Video to Dec. 6 announce that Rosas, the Dictator of Buenos Ayres, was about to strike a grand blow to recover his influence in the provinces of the Argentine Confederation, which was put in jeopardy by Urquiza's defeat of his creature Oribe, as announced a few weeks back. Rosas, it is said, has collected an army of 30,000 men. General Urquiza was to cross the Parana on the 15th of December to commence hostilities against the Dictator. The Brazilian army encamped near Monte Video, but had not fired a shot. Treaties had been concluded with the Brazilian Government, defining the boundaries of the two countries, and binding them to assist each other in case of attack.

THE PRIMATES OF ENGLAND ON THE ROYAL SUPREMACY.

The following correspondence, which has been published this week, is of so important a character that we give it in full:—

I.—LETTER TO THE PRIMATES ENCLOSING THE DECLARATION.

31, Charterhouse-square, Dec. 31, 1851.

My dear Lord Archbishop, I am requested by the "Supremacy and Gorham Cause Declaration Committee" to forward to your Grace the enclosed "declaration," which has now been signed by 3262 of the clergy (not including seven names which we have been unable to verify); among whom are seven Deans, twelve Archdeacons, and a large number of the dignitaries of the Church throughout the kingdom.

These signatures have been obtained, not by means of application sent to all the clergy, but by private correspondence with persons known to the committee, and a few advertisements in the newspapers; consequently the number so obtained cannot be considered as at all an adequate representation of that portion of the clergy who would have adopted the "declaration" if it had been sent to them in a body; and, further, the answers which we have received to our circular represents but a fraction of those who cordially agree with the views stated in the "declaration," a very large number of the clergy being reluctant, from failing to recognise its necessity and other causes, to make any public movement. In the circular with a feeling of reluctance to issue such declarations needlessly, the committee cordially sympathise; nor was it till some time had elapsed after the delivery of the Gorham judgment that it was determined to offer the clergy an opportunity of publicly testifying their sense of its value. But circumstances, to which it is unnecessary further to allude, seemed to render it a duty incumbent upon them to make known their sentiments on the subject, lest by failing to disabuse the public mind of the false impression which it had been taught to entertain respecting their views in the matter, but also to discountenance any attempt that might be made to set aside in practice a judgment solemnly pronounced by the ultimate court of appeal in matters ecclesiastical; and for these purposes the names appended to the enclosed "declaration" appear to the committee to be amply sufficient, coming as they do from every diocese and from all parts of the kingdom, and amongst, probably, to about one-fourth part of the officiating clergy, especially when it is recollected that a recent declaration of a contrary kind, which was sent to every beneficed clergyman throughout the whole body of the clergy, and also to the lay members of the Universities, obtained, as is well known, less than 1800 signatures, lay and clerical together.

I am, my dear Lord Archbishop,
Your Grace's obliged and faithful servant,
W. GOODE.

II.—THE DECLARATION ENCLOSED

A Declaration, by the undersigned Clergy of the Church of England, in support of the Royal Supremacy in things Ecclesiastical, and of the wisdom and authority of the Judgment emanating from its recent exercise.

We, the undersigned clergy of the Church of England, viewing with surprise and concern the attempts made by parties holding office in the Church to invalidate and nullify the judgment recently delivered by the sovereign, as "supreme Governor of this realm, as well in all spiritual or ecclesiastical things or causes as temporal," by the advice of the Privy Council and the Primates of the Church, in the case of "Gorham v. the Bishop of Exeter," humbly testify our thankfulness for the judgment so delivered, and feel ourselves called upon, under present circumstances (whether holding or not the view which called forth the judgment), humbly to state our conviction that it was a wise and just sentence, in accordance with the principles or the Church of England.

And we respectfully, but firmly, protest against any attempt, from whatever quarter it may proceed, to bring into contempt a judgment so issued, and to charge with false teaching and discredit with their flocks those whose doctrine has been pronounced by that judgment to be "not contrary or repugnant to the declared doctrine of the Church of England."

Such attempts we hold to be equivalent to the enforcement of a standard of doctrine in our Church, by unauthorised individuals, opposed to that established by its supreme authority, and, consequently, to be irreconcilable with the first principles of all church polity, and necessarily to lead to a state of disorder, strife, and confusion in the Church.

III.—REPLY OF THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY.

Addington, Jan. 2.

My dear Sir,—I have much satisfaction in receiving the declaration which you have forwarded to me from so numerous a body of clergy upon a subject which I sincerely hope may no longer be permitted to disturb the peace of our Church.

There are many questions in theology upon which Christians may differ without reproach to themselves or injury to others. From the Reformation until the present time numbers of our clergy have subscribed the same articles, have used the same formularies, have ministered in the same churches, whose sentiments, if they had been obliged to state them with logical precision, would have been found to vary, more or less, from each other, both with regard to regeneration and to the effect of infant baptism. But this difference has not prevented their harmonious co-operation. It is a comprehensiveness; and I should have been seriously grieved if the period of my archiepiscopacy had been chosen as the period when freedom of opinion, within the reasonable limits hitherto deemed allowable, was, for the first time, to be made to our clergy a matter where it is not denied them by the word of God or the declared doctrine of the Church of England. I remain, my dear sir, very faithfully yours,

Rev. William Goode. J. B. CANTUAR.

IV.—REPLY OF THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK.

Bishopthorpe, York, Jan. 5.

My dear Sir,—I beg to acknowledge the receipt of the declaration, and of your letter which accompanied it.

I am glad to find such a large number of the clergy agree in regarding "the judgment" alluded to as "a wise and just sentence, in accordance with the principles of the Church of England."

Concurring entirely in that opinion, I would only add the expression of my sincere hope that it may be considered by all parties as a final settlement of the point in dispute, and thus tend to promote that peace and harmony among ourselves which the times and the circumstances of the Church require.

I am, my dear Sir, your faithful servant,
The Rev. W. Goode. T. EBOR.

ECCLESIASTICAL LEGISLATION.—At the monthly meeting of the London Union on Church matters, held on Tuesday, at St. Martin's Hall, the secretary's report, which was adopted, contained the following passage:—"Papers setting out the way in which bills are brought into Parliament affecting the clergy, without their feelings or opinions being consulted in the matter, have been brought under the committee's notice, and have been referred to the consideration of the sub-committee on diocesan synods. The Union has, however, ever stated its opinion that it will be the best course for Churchmen to object to all legislation for the Church until her own provincial synod have been reconstructed with powers to make canons that shall not need the assent of Parliament seriatim." Should any such bill, however, be referred by the Ministry into Parliament, the committee recommend the clergy to act on the judicious suggestion made by the South Church Union at its recent meeting, and call on their diocesan to convene their clergy to consider the matter, with a view of hearing their opinions on this mode of legislating for the Church, and, should it be thought expedient, of considering the provisions of the bill.

SOCIETY FOR THE PROPAGATION OF THE GOSPEL.—A meeting in connexion with the third jubilee recently held in commemoration of this society took place on Wednesday evening, at the Parochial School-room, South Hackney, in aid of the South Hackney Church Fund. The Rev. G. P. Lockwood, the rector, presided, and stated that the church fund was established about twelve years ago for the support of five societies—the Church Building Society, the National Society, the Additional Curates' Society, the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, and the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel. The last-named society now more especially claimed their attention, on account of being in its jubilee year. Nearly every parish either had or would have its jubilee commemoration, the celebration having also extended to the colonies and to the American Episcopal Church. After a rapid sketch of the society's operations from its foundation in 1701, the reverend gentleman pointed out the gradual, but astonishing, increase which had taken place in the funds of the society. In 1701 the subscriptions were only £234; in 1750, £718; in 1800, £4325; in 1820, £13371; in 1838, £10,919; and in 1850, £26,843; while the society's income from all sources amounted to no less than £94,874. The number of missionaries now supported by the society was about 400. Dr. Williams read the annual report of the South Hackney Church Fund, from which it appeared that the income during the past year had been £168, making, with those of previous years, £2838. The appropriation of last year's fund had been as follows:—To the Society for Propagating the Gospel, £34 1s. 10½d.; to the National Society, £43 2s. 4d.; to the Additional Curates Society, £284 14s. 1d.; to the South Hackney District Christian Knowledge Society, £20 9s. 4d., and to the Church Building Fund, £29 12s. 4d. The report was adopted. The Rev. J. Jefferson, one of the secretaries of the parent society, said that it was hard been twofold from the very first—to attend to our own colonists and also to the heathen amongst whom they were placed. To do either they must do both, for the two duties were intermingled. Other speakers followed, and the proceedings closed with a vote of thanks to the rev. chairman.

LONDON CONGREGATIONAL CHAPEL BUILDING SOCIETY.—A meeting took place on Wednesday evening at the Poultry Chapel; the Lord Mayor in the chair. The report stated that since 1848 the society had been the means of erecting or of aiding in the erection of eight handsome and commodious chapels in destitute and populous localities: viz. Horsbury chapel, Haverstockhill chapel, the City-road chapel, Bedford chapel, Somers-town, Portland chapel, Portland-town, Southgate-road chapel, and Nottingdale Potteries chapel. It had also secured the preservation and successful use of Portland chapel, near St. John's-wood, and this was exclusive of enterprises in which the society was now engaged. It was proposed, in connexion with the society, to effect the erection of at least 50 new Congregational chapels. Supposing this to be accomplished, the number of Congregational chapels in London would still be under 300, and that in a population which ten years hence could hardly be less than three millions. The meeting was addressed by Samuel Morley, Esq., the Rev. Dr. Leifchild, and other ministers.

THE NEW CHURCH AT HAMPSTEAD.—During the severe storm of wind which raged on the night of the 28th instant, the vane and about sixteen feet of the top of the steeple of the new church at Hampstead were blown down. The whole fell at the foot of the tower, and did comparatively little injury.

MR. BENNETT.—In the reply of the Bishop of Bath and Wells to a protest which had been addressed to him, from certain persons of Frome, against Mr. Bennett's presentation to the living of that place, his Lordship says:—"I can assure you, had I not been satisfied that Mr. Bennett was not attached to, or likely to be influenced by, the doctrines of the Church of Rome, or likely to influence in that direction others of any congregation committed to his care, I should have declined instituting him, from whatever quarter his nomination might have proceeded; but as I am fully satisfied that Mr. Bennett has a firm and deep-rooted attachment to our own Church, and to all the doctrines of the Church of England, repudiating all Romish doctrines, I feel that I should be acting unjustly to him, and unfortunately by the Parishioners of Bath (whose firm attachment to our Church is so well known), if I were to refuse him admission into my diocese."

THE AUSTRALIAN GOLD-FIELDS.

The following particulars respecting the recent enormous discoveries of gold-mines in Bathurst, and the surrounding parts of the country, have been received lately in this country from a person who resides in Sydney, New South Wales:—

Woolcomooloo, Sydney, N. S. W., Sept. 3, 1851.

This colony (Sydney) still remains in a very agitated state, owing to the gold fever, which is not in the least way abated. People of every class of society are constantly leaving here for the "diggings," and almost every business is at an entire stand-still. We are afraid that a number of our police are going to desert us and be off to the mines, for it is rumoured that nearly forty of the city police and all the water police are about to resign the bâton for the purpose of trying their luck at gold-finding. It is also reported that the police which are stationed at Cockatoo Island intend to try a change of scene and are on a similar errand. I am sorry to say that provisions are still very high in price, and business is very dull.

I enclose you some specimens from a friend at Bathurst, which we received a short time back. Let my friends in England read it, as it will show them the present state of the scene of operations.

The subjoined extracts are taken from the letter referred to above, and are dated:—

Bathurst, August 14, 1851.

The gold-diggers are doing wonders on Mr. Wentworth's land at Frederick's Valley. There are two brothers of the name of Hagham who in two days procured 4lbs. weight of gold; the one of the pieces of gold they found was lumps weighing respectively 11½ and 14 ounces. As this gold is found in a large quartz vein and in the matrix, I should not be surprised at some enormous discoveries of auriferous wealth being made in that locality.

Several parties have arrived here from the Turon, and the accounts received from there are of a very satisfactory nature. A great number of the diggers are doing remarkably well, and many are running about, prospecting in the small creeks and tributaries of the river. It is pretty generally the opinion of most parties there that those who have a mind to work and persevere can make sure remunerative wages.

Three sailors, who a fortnight since arrived here from Sydney, have procured £800 worth of the precious metal from the "claim" they are now working near the Wallaby Rocks, for which they have lately refused £800. A great quantity of gold has arrived in town within the last four days. In small lots; but Mondays and Tuesdays are the principal days on which the gold arrives, in time for the escort on Wednesday morning.

It is rumoured in town that Mr. Rotton, the mail contractor, has entered into an arrangement with the Government to run a daily mail from Bathurst to Sydney. Since the increasing traffic and number of arrivals to our district, this was much required, for since the gold discovery, a person travelling from Bathurst, per mail would require to book himself three weeks in advance of his arrival in Sydney, to ensure a passage by the return mail."

PIRACY AND MURDER IN THE INDIAN ARCHIPELAGO.

The pirates of the Indian Archipelago, to whose atrocities attention was drawn some time back, have again furnished materials for a harrowing narrative. The following account refers to the murder of two gentlemen and a portion of the crew of a brig by a most outrageous attack made on their vessel by some Lanun and Suloo pirates in Malluda Bay. The following particulars were obtained from a gentleman who formed one of the expedition which made diligent inquiries on the spot as to the tragedy:—

The H. C. steamer Pluto, on her way from Labuan to the N.E. coast of Borneo, touched at Malluda Bay, at which place intelligence was received of the capture by pirates of the schooner Dolphin, and the murder of Mr. Burns (supercargo) and Robertson (captain), as also a portion of the crew. This outrage is reported to have taken place on or about the 7th or 8th of September last. The circumstances under which it appears that in the evening, while the vessel was under way, two boats manned by ten men went alongside and intimated their desire to trade, which Captain Robertson declined to do until daylight next morning. About seven o'clock on the following day, two men, one a Lanun, and the other a Suloo man, went on board, apparently to trade with Mr. Burns, having with them some mats, pearls, and camphor. Whilst Mr. Burns was in a stooping posture, his attention taken up examining some pearls in his hand, a Borneo man, called up, was handed from the boat, which harms glanced at, and on which was concealed a Suloo kris. The pretended trader adroitly drew out the hidden weapon, and at a single blow severed Burns's head from his body. Captain Robertson was pacing up and down the quarter-deck, and at this juncture his back was towards Burns. The Suloo man, observing Burns despatched, made a cut at Robertson's neck, who, turning at the instant, received a kris-wound across the chin, and ran forward to the jiboom-end, whence he begged hard for his life. From one of the boats, under the schooner's bows, several spears were thrown at Robertson, who fell into the water and was finished by a spear run through his body. Three of the crew (Malays) were also butchered. Not the least resistance was offered, and the arms were all below in the hold. The rest of the crew took to the water or escaped up the rigging; their lives were spared, and they were bound with ropes. A native woman on board was cut to pieces, two and thrown into the sea. On obtaining this information the Pluto proceeded to Malluda Bay, to which place the Dolphin was supposed to have been taken by the pirates. Owing to the shallowness of the water the boats were not ready, consisting of the two paddle-box boats, each fitted with a 6-pounder, and the first-cutter gig, under the command of Mr. Hodges, of the Pluto, all manned as per Mr. St. John, officiating commissioner. In consequence of the intricacy of the Benguin river, some difficulty was experienced in hitting upon the right channel. After passing some distance, the Dolphin was seen, and observed pulling towards the shallows; and at six P.M. Mr. Hodges boarded the schooner Dolphin, at anchor in the Benguin river. The same evening Mr. Hodges went up the river to see the chief, from whom he was soon ascertained that on the schooner's arrival he demanded of the pirates what it was; they said a cargo of rice, which was found to be the Sulooes are a Spain, they had a right to take her. The crew were then separated, but from fear answered they did not know what flag the vessel sailed under; but on the chief's people, seeing the crew, said "You are Mr. Burns's crew. I have seen the schooner at Brunai." The crew then told the chief what had happened, upon which the chief himself cut down one of the pirates, others were wounded, and some captured, but were subsequently released by a large party of Suloo and Lanuns, who threatened to return and destroy the chief of Brunai. The details towed the Dolphin to Labuk Bay, and on the 21st November the Pluto The steamer next day towed the Dolphin trance of Malluda Bay, placed on board four European native crew, and dispatched the schooner to Singapore.

BURGHER FINGOES ON THE FRONTIER OF CAPE COLONY.

THE KAFFIR WAR.

We continue to be favoured with characteristic Sketches illustrative of the war in Kaffraria. The first of the accompanying scenes is thus described in the following extract from a letter, dated Alice, Cape of Good Hope, 28th Oct., 1851:

"I enclose a pen-and-ink sketch of a 'scene' in South Africa. The figures in their shirts are intended for our Fingoes, with gun and assegai. The figures on the mountains represent the position held by the enemy. The accoutrements of the principal figures show those employed when the parties set out for two or three days' patrol. When they go out for a longer period, additional articles are required, as a matter of course.

"The rebels and Kaffirs still continue to make a most determined stand against our troops. For the last fourteen days, our troops, from 5000 to 6000 in number, have been bombarding and charging them in one of the almost impenetrable natural fortresses of this country, about 30 miles from this place. Very exaggerated reports have been circulated respecting the loss of the enemy, which, it is now generally believed, is comparatively small. We have lost ten men killed, and thirty wounded. Altogether, we have nothing to boast of; no impression appears to have been made as yet. The day before yesterday the bombarding was heard there again. We are hourly waiting for the result. Vague reports announce another failure, and it is as yet pretty clear that the enemy hold their fastnesses."

The second Sketch shows Buffalo Mouth, or the Port of East London, with the Styx steamer landing (close in) horses, &c., for the service: the dark spots represent the surf-boats on the Wasp; the two rows of waggons are waiting for hire; a train of these conveyances sometimes, in travelling, occupies perhaps three miles, and is escorted by fifty men.

H.M. STEAM-TENDER "ALBAN" RESCUING THE CREW OF AN AMERICAN BRIGANTINE.

We have been favoured by a Correspondent with the accompanying Sketch of H.M. steam-tender Alban discovering the wreck of an ill-fated American brigantine, the Mesurdis, of New York, on her voyage from Chagres, Navy Bay, to Jackson, in the United States, when there were rescued two of her crew, who had been there from the 31st of August to the 23d November. Both were very sickly, and in all probability would have died had the timely arrival of the Alban been delayed much longer. The following account appeared in the Jamaica Standard:—

"H.M. steamer Alban, Lieut. Craufurd, arrived at Port Royal on Saturday last from the Serranilla Keys, in six days. The Alban brought up two men from the wreck of an American brigantine, lost on the reef. The following is a narrative of the discovery of the wreck, in search of which H.M. steamer Alban recently went, and two lives saved: 'H.M. steamer Alban proceeded on the afternoon of the 21st November from Port Royal to the Serranilla Bank, in search of distressed American seamen believed to be located in Beacon Cay, in the immediate vicinity of the above bank. On the Alban approaching her destination, Lieut Craufurd observed a tent erected on the Cay, out of which a man was remarked to go waving his hat in great triumph and joy: the steamer then, with great care, stood as near the Cay as practicable, and observed the wreck of the ill-fated vessel, which was almost broken up, lying on the most exposed point of land, with the force of the sea sweeping over her. The Alban was then brought to in the safest place, when the gig and cutter were lowered down for the purpose of rendering whatever assistance might be requisite: the boats were speedily manned—the cutter in charge of Mr. Bell, gunner, with a crew of nine hands; the party in the gig consisting of Lieutenant Craufurd, with four men, and Dr. Crawford, assistant-surgeon; the latter gentleman proceeding for the purpose of affording whatever professional services might be necessary. After the boats left the vessel, great dexterity and skill were evinced by the officers in charge, in the very careful and efficient manner in which they piloted their little craft through the dangerous surf, which was breaking with great violence all round the beach. Lieutenant Craufurd was the first to go on shore, leaving Dr. Crawford in charge of the boat, with orders to keep clear of breakers till his return, and to be ready, if necessary, to visit the afflicted. On Lieutenant Craufurd's arrival at the tent, he learned that the crew of the unfortunate vessel consisted of seven originally, and two passengers, who were cast away on the night of the 31st of August. The master, however, two months afterwards proceeded with two of the crew towards the Mosquito coast in search of assistance. The six left on Beacon Cay were very sickly, and became worse, four of whom fell victims to the vicissitude of climate and want of proper nourishment, and the other two must have evidently fallen victims had the Alban's timely arrival been delayed two days longer. In conclusion, great credit is due to the commander, and Mr. W. G. Aldrich, second master, for the able way in which they conducted their vessel amongst those cays (although in the hour of darkness), which are known to be the worst and most dangerous in the West India pilotage.'"

On the Alban's return to Port Royal a letter of thanks was received by the Commodore from the American Consul in Kingston, in which he desired the expression of his warmest thanks to the commander, officers and crew of the Alban, which letter was read to these persons on the quarter-deck of H. M. ship Imaum.

H. M. S. ALBAN" RESCUING A PART OF THE CREW OF AN AMERICAN BRIGANTINE IN SERRANILLA KEYS.

GREAT RUNNING MATCH IN COPENHAGEN FIELDS, ON MONDAY.

GREAT RUNNING MATCH FOR THE CHAMPION'S BELT, AND A SWEEPSTAKES IN CASH, IN COPENHAGEN-FIELDS.

NEARLY all the pedestrians of celebrity were brought together on Monday, either to compete for the championship, or to witness the performance of the swiftest foot-racers of the present time. Although the weather was showery and unfavourable, thousands of spectators congregated on this well-known sporting-ground. The arrangements were excellent, preventing confusion, obstruction, and annoyance; so that the competitors came to the scratch in admirable order, starting at fifty minutes past two o'clock, to the satisfaction of the immense throng, computed to exceed 4600 persons.

The Champion's Belt (the chief prize contended for) is a beautiful piece of workmanship, of rich purple Genoa velvet, 6 feet in length, and 4 inches in width: in its centre is a silver shield, with richly chased figures in bold relief, emblematic of pedestrian sports, the top part of the shield having a figure of Mercury holding the wreath of victory, in another part showing two groups of human figures in a field, all in silver, contesting a running match; a massive silver buckle and tab, the whole bordered with white satin; the back of the belt being embroidered with silver laurel leaves. The cost of the whole was £25.

By twelve o'clock there were 18 competitors entered, each naming a colour he proposed running in, so that the sight was very imposing when the whole number of these pedestrians were ranged for the start; Jackson, Grantham, Levitt, Swift, Tetlow, and Frost appearing to have the greatest number of backers. The odds before starting were as follow:—2 to 1 agst Grantham; 3 to 1 agst Levitt, Frost, or Tetlow. Manks (although on the ground) refused to start.

At ten minutes before three o'clock the pedestrians went away at a tremendous speed, Pudney (Mile-end) with the lead; Tetlow (Oldham), second; Levitt (Battersea), third; Frost (Suffolk Stag), Jackson (American Deer), and Adams (Mitcham) close behind, with very little alteration during the performance of the first mile (three times round the ground). Levitt then shot ahead—Pudney second, Tetlow third, Frost fourth, Adams and Griffiths (Walworth) well up. Levitt gave up in the tenth round, and Grantham in the twelfth; Jackson not running more than five miles. At the completion of the fourth mile Frost had obtained the lead—Tetlow being second, Adams third, Pudney fourth, Jackson fifth; after which Frost was never caught, but won the prize with comparative ease, by from 200 to 300 yards in advance of Tetlow, who came in second; Pudney being third, Adams fourth, and Kelly fifth; the last two being full 600 yards behind Frost. The winner went over his ten miles in the almost incredibly short time (considering the weather and wet ground) of 54 minutes 21 seconds—the last two passing the winning flag in 55 minutes 57 seconds.

The Belt was given up to the winner the same evening, at the Copenhagen Tavern, in the presence of a large concourse of sporting gentlemen and pedestrians.

THE NORTH LONDON SCHOOL OF DRAWING AND MODELLING, CAMDEN TOWN.—(SEE NEXT PAGE.)

SUBURBAN ARTISAN SCHOOLS.—THE NORTH LONDON SCHOOL OF DRAWING AND MODELLING.

THIS establishment presents one of the most gratifying successes of the recent attempts to extend the means of art-education in this country.

The above School, situated at Camden-town, a locality favourable as the residence of a superior class of workmen, may be considered a model-school for the education of art-workmen. The institution has been in active operation for nearly two years, and has more than realised the expectations of its most sanguine promoters, being attended by about 150 male and 30 female pupils.

The School is under the patronage of his Royal Highness Prince Albert, to whose liberality it is greatly indebted. It is conducted by a committee of artists, architects, and manufacturers; the separate classes being under the supervision of practical artists of established repute.

It has long been felt, that, as a nation, we were in artistic taste inferior to our Continental neighbours. For a century past Paris has supported seventeen such subsidiary schools out of the municipal funds. Our Government was, therefore, called upon to provide similar means of instruction; and, in obedience to this demand, have established schools of design in London and in various provincial towns. These schools have been to a certain extent useful, though the general feeling about them has been one of disappointment; and justly so, for they promised more than they could possibly fulfil. Pupils in vain expected that in two, three, or four years they should be sent forth able to prepare for any manufacturer who might pay for their services, designs, original, artistic, and easily executed by the practical workman. All acted upon a low basis; the Government who provided the schools, the wealthy manufacturers who subscribed to them, and the pupils who flocked to them to learn so pleasant and easy a method of making a livelihood.

A few practical men residing in the neighbourhood of this school, having come to the conclusion that schools of design were "fundamentally wrong in principle," resolved to attempt the establishment of a school which should not aim at more than it could teach in a right way. They limited their efforts to the teaching of their future pupils to make a correct representation of any object placed before them; leaving them to acquire with skill of hand that education of the eye which should enable them to discriminate between graceful and ungraceful combinations of form. To quote from a pamphlet written by Mr. Thomas—"This system does not attempt to make designers otherwise than by inculcating the general principles of art: the combination of these, with their practical knowledge of various processes, will form their own judgment, they being best acquainted with those constructive conditions to which art applied to the manufactures should be subservient."

We are glad to learn, that such success has attended their efforts, that "the Committee now feel warranted in extending their sphere of usefulness by establishing similar institutions in other localities."

The schools are supported partly by the payments of the pupils (at the rate of 1d. per night), and partly by voluntary subscriptions.

Associated with this subject there is an advantage which, to many persons, will appear of equal or greater importance than the qualification for their own judgment—we mean the opportunity which it affords to women for the lucrative employment of their time in a manner suited to their tastes and domestic character.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

CABINET COUNCIL.—On the 9th inst. summonses were issued to attend two Cabinet Councils this week, on the 14th and 15th instant: the first was held on Wednesday afternoon at the Foreign-office. The Ministers present were Lord John Russell, the Lord Chancellor, the Marquis of Lansdowne, the Earl of Minto, Sir George Grey, Earl Granville, Earl Grey, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir Francis Baring, Lord Broughton, the Right Hon. Henry Labouchere, the Marquis of Clanricarde, the Right Hon. Fox Maule, and Lord Seymour. The Council sat two hours and a half. Lords Minto and Broughton, who were absent from the Cabinet Council held on the previous week, came to town on the Sunday morning to attend the Council held on the 9th inst. Nothing of any importance was decided. The second Cabinet Council was held at noon. The Ministers present were—Lord J. Russell, the Marquis of Lansdowne, Lord Broughton, the Lord Chancellor, Sir G. Grey, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Earl of Granville, the Earl of Minto, Earl Grey, the Right Hon. H. Labouchere, Sir F. T. Baring, the Marquis of Clanricarde, Lord Seymour, and the Right Hon. Fox Maule.

MINISTERIAL MOVEMENTS AND RUMOURS.—On Monday Lord Normanby transacted business at the Foreign-office. The Globe of Monday states that Lord Clanricarde has declared his intention to leave the Cabinet as soon as a successor can be procured, and that the noble Lord has been solicited to take the French embassy, should Lord Normanby become a member of the Cabinet. On Tuesday the Postmaster-General (Lord Clanricarde) had an interview with the Chancellor of the Exchequer in Downing-street; the Secretary-General Militaire with Earl Grey, at the Colonial-office; and Mr. Granville Berkeley with Sir G. Grey, at the Home-office. Captain R. S. Dundas, R.N., had an interview with the Prime Minister on Wednesday, in Downing-street.

THE ENGLISH EMBASSY IN MADRID.—The Morning Chronicle correspondent writes from Madrid on the 4th instant:—"I have been, and I have reason to be sure that the assertion is true, that Lord Howden has sent in his resignation." At the banquet given by Maria Christina, on the 6th instant, the absence of the English Minister was remarked.

BOARD OF CUSTOMS.—There is no foundation for the statement of a morning contemporary, that a committee has been appointed by the Government, and is now sitting at the Custom-house, on the management of Customs. The statement that Sir Thomas Fremantle, chairman of the Board of Customs, is about to be replaced by another chief commissioner, is equally unfounded. The Customs reforms, to the accomplishment of which the attention of the inquiry committee is announced to be specially directed, were effected within the last year ago, at the instance of Sir Thomas Fremantle, Sir Alexander Spearman, and Mr. Hayter.—Globe.

THE EXTRA-MURAL INTERMENTS BILL.—The Prime Minister had appointed Monday to receive a deputation from Marylebone respecting this bill but on the members assembling at the Court-house, headed by Lord Dudley Coutts Stuart, to wait on their sitting for Downing-street, they were duly received a note from Mr. A. Russell, the Minister's secretary, explaining that Lord John Russell had sent word he would not be in town before Wednesday and that his Lordship must have forgotten the deputation appointed to meet him on Monday. The second note added that it was too late to send to Richmond, and promised to let the deputation know when the Minister could receive the Marylebone memorial. Lord Dudley Stuart declared that it was "very bad behaviour" on the part of the Premier, as he had himself made the appointment. During a short conversation on some suggestion by Sir Benjamin Hall, that the parochial authorities should have the management of extramural interments, Lord Dudley Stuart stated that Lord Seymour was to have the management of the amended bill next session, and that he was favourable to the principle of parochial control. A suggestion was then made that it would be better for the deputation to see Lord Seymour, and some of the members seemed to think that Lord John Russell would not be long in office, and it was, therefore, a waste of time to see his Lordship. After a little further discussion, in which the Premier's failure to keep his appointment was protested against, the deputation agreed to see his Lordship as soon as possible. On Lord Palmerston's name being mentioned as the probable successor of Lord J. Russell, there was great applause.

SOCIETY OF ARTS.—The fifth of the series of lectures on subjects connected with the Great Exhibition was delivered on Wednesday evening by Dr. Lindley, the subject being "Substances used as Food." Sir John Rolfuck, Bart., was in the chair. The lecturer entered into the subject of wheat, wheat—one of the most remarkable specimens of which was a sample forwarded from our South Australian colonies—a wheat that was undeniably the first produced in the world, as one weighing the almost incredible weight of 70 lbs. per bushel, the only other wheat approaching it in quality being the produce of Castile, in Spain, known commonly under the denomination of Talavera wheat. It would, however, be utter mistake to suppose that such a wheat as this, if sown in England would produce a better crop than our indigenous kind, the quality of which wheat depends not so much on soil as on climate. The subject of crossing different species of cereals had been little studied, and it had been proved that samples in the Exhibition that important results might be obtained. Plantains from Mexico could be produced in this country in quantity at a low price, and may become a valuable adjunct to the nourishing of our Royal Navy and mercantile marine. Dried vegetables were more acceptable at sea than preserved fresh meats, which palled on the appetite. If proper precautions were taken the meats would keep for years. Dried salmon, forwarded to this country from Russia and Texas was so nutritious that 10 lb. would maintain a man in full vigour for four days. It is formed by boiling down the best portions of meat, and mixing the extract with meal, and then drying. Among articles of luxury, tea and coffee stood nearly destroyed for their hides and bones only, as in the Argentine Republic, may have the edible portions in future converted to a nutritious and portable ailment. Dr. Lindley referred to coffee, cocoa, theine and caffeine, and to the loans of the best coffee trees in Java, &c. &c. It was probable that the highest portions of the Himalaya mountains, would produce tea of the finest quality—50,000 to 60,000 lb. of spurious or 1 lb. tea had been recently imported into Liverpool. The lecturer said a few words on tobacco. A vote was voted to Dr. Lindley, and a strong feeling was expressed that the Crystal Palace should be retained, in which were now lying £10,000 worth of specimens presented to the Royal Commission.

INSTITUTION OF CIVIL ENGINEERS.—Mr J. M. Rendel, the recently elected president, delivered his inaugural address at Monday's meeting. He expressed his hope for the dominion between employers and their workmen, which must ever be productive of evil to both, but invariably ends in permanent injury to the men, whose occupation is the construction of machines by which manual labour is only apparently superseded, whilst civilisation is thereby invariably induced by affording to mankind increased powers over the materials of the world. He hoped the men would discard the erroneous notion that capital is the foe of labour, and that as the employers have expressed their willingness to consider any individual representations made in a fitting manner, this unhappy dispute may be arranged without prejudice to either party. It must be very pernicious influence that could render a body of such intelligent men an unobservant of the true laws regulating supply and demand, as to imagine they could control the prices of the labour necessary to produce those very labour saving machines of their own manufacture, and which it is evidently their true interest to see multiplied. The several objects were stated, the more they could be such an increased cost of machinery and such uncertainty in its production, last either the trade would be driven to other countries, or the factories here must be manned by skilled foreign workmen, whose productions are even now scarcely second to ours.

ROYAL HUMANE SOCIETY.—The half-yearly meeting of this society was held on Tuesday, at the offices, Trafalgar-square; Mr. S. B. Bicknell, M.P., in the chair. The following silver medals were awarded:—First—To gunner and driver John Gray, who saved the life of private Tane, of the 95th Regiment, who was bathing in the Dardanelles. Second—W. Wilson and Thomas Bowyer, both of Mr. W. J. Anstey, who had been pushed off the dock-wall of the London Docks when about to go on board an emigrant vessel. Third—Mr. W. T. Ju lan and Wilson Boyd; saved Thomas Stevens, who had fallen overboard at Plymouth. Fourth—Mr. W. Wickham; saved a female infant that had fallen into the River Frome. Fifth—Lieutenant C. S. Stanhope, of H.M.S. Ajax; saved a seaman named Carbogne, belonging to the same ship. Sixth—Mr. P. Dancy, resident engineer of the Severn Navigation; saved Private Jones, of the 53rd Regiment. Seventh—Mr. W. H. Richards, B.A., of Jesus College, Cambridge; saved John Ledbury, who had fallen off the pier at Portsmouth. Eighth—Mr. W. C. Angove, first officer of the Zealand; saved Second Officer Wood from the sea off the Southampton Docks. Ninth—Charles Burgess, railway guard; saved John Pemberton, engine-driver, who twice attempted suicide, upon occasion of the late unfortunate accident on the London and Brighton Railway, near Chichester. Tenth—T. T. Oddy, saved Mr. Vicary, who had been carried out to sea whilst bathing at Brighton. The receipts of the year amounted to £1890 8s. 8d., and the expenditure to £2795 7s. 2d. The lives saved in the Metropolis during the year were, 191,147. There had been 23 casualties, but only one had proved fatal.

ROYAL INSTITUTE OF BRITISH ARCHITECTS.—On Monday evening the ordinary meeting of the winter session took place; Mr. Fowler (the vice-president) in the chair. Professor Donaldson delivered an address on the subject of polychromy as applied to architecture by the ancients, with the view chiefly of drawing attention to a work of M. J. J. Hittorff, a distinguished architect of Paris, entitled "L'Architecture Polychrome chez les Grecs." The lecturer, whose remarks were illustrated by a large collection of beautiful coloured drawings, endeavoured to show that in every branch of the fine arts the Greeks and the Romans to embellish the whole surface of the exterior and interior of their temples and monuments with rich and diversified colouring, citing in support of this opinion the authority of many learned travellers who had carefully examined the interesting remains of the Parthenon, the Theseum, the Propylæ, &c., at Athens, and other classic cities.

THE BANKING INSTITUTE.—From the report read at Tuesday's meeting, at Sussex-place, in Throgmorton-street, it appears that the business is thriving. The governor of the Bank of England had offered to aid it, and liberal donations had been received. The reading-room was to be opened with a moderate subscription. Mr. Gilbart had paid over to Mr. Crawford's Sharp, account to the East of England Bank at Norwich, the prize of £100 for the best essay on the question, "in what manner can any of the articles collected at the Great Exhibition be rendered especially serviceable to the interest of practical banking?" Mr. Staw read a paper on the law and practice of issuing cheques. The law was very unsatisfactory on the point, which ought to be definitely settled, as the custom was alike bound, at present, on the public and the banks. He gave an account of the Clearing House. Mr Gilbart thought the mercantile and banking interest ought to apply to the Legislature to sanction the custom of crossing cheques, as it would tend to diminish the chances of forgery.

THE GREAT EXHIBITION.—His Royal Highness Prince Albert presided on Wednesday morning at a meeting of the Royal Commission for the Exhibition in 1851 of the Works of Industry of all Nations. His Royal Highness arrived at the New Palace of Westminster at eleven o'clock. The other Commissioners present were—Earl Granville, the Right Hon. Henry Labouchere, Sir Richard Westmacott, Sir Charles Lyell, Sir Charles L. Eastlake, Sir William Cubitt, Mr. Barry, Mr. T. F. Gibson, Mr. John Gott, Mr. Fuzey, M.P., Mr. Alderman Thompson, M.P., and Mr. Hopkins, President of the Geological Society. Mr. Scott Russell and Mr. Edward Bowring, Secretaries of the Royal Commission, Colonel Reid, Captain Cole and Mr. Digby Wyatt, Executive Committee, were also present. The meeting broke up at one o'clock, when Prince Albert took his departure, and returned to Windsor Castle.

KING'S COLLEGE HOSPITAL.—At the last meeting of the committee of management of this hospital, a letter was read from Sir W. H. Leeds, M.P., one of the directors of the East India Company, announcing his intention of placing at the disposal of that body the appointment of an assistant-surgeon in the Company's service, to be conferred on one of the students of the hospital, who is to be selected for his professional merits, and his correct and gentlemanlike conduct. Such a noble and judicious exercise of patronage reflects credit, not only on Mr. Rowden, but also on the institution which he has thought worthy of his bounty.

HOSPITAL FOR CONSUMPTION AND DISEASES OF THE CHEST, AT BROMPTON.—On Thursday a very full meeting was held of the committee of management of the above institution; the Hon. J. W. Fergy in the chair. The minutes of the previous meeting having been read and confirmed, it was stated that the directors had determined on the establishment of a sanatorian institution at Bournemouth, for the further improvement of convalescent patients, and that a committee was forming for the purpose of carrying out the distinctive objects of this branch of the charity. His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge had kindly consented to preside at the forthcoming annual festival, to be held at the Albion Tavern. It was also reported that the eastern wing of the edifice had been proceeded with to the extent of the second story, under the skilful superintendence of Mr. H. W. Cooper, of Wakefield-street, Regent-square; and very sanguine hope was entertained, that, by the continuation of the support hitherto given to this work of benevolence, the committee would be enabled to hasten its final completion. The usual vote of thanks having been passed, the meeting separated

LICENSED VICTUALLERS' ASYLUM.—The annual ball in aid of the funds of this institution took place on Wednesday night, and was remarkably well attended. Nearly 800 persons assembled, and dancing was kept up with great ardour to a late hour. Among all the trade charities in London this takes the lead, and it is even said to be the largest in the kingdom supported by voluntary contributions. It maintains no less than 130 separate tenements for decayed members of the licensed victuallers' fraternity, and the year which has just closed has seen it released from debt. This has been mainly accomplished by the liberality of the great brewers, and the efforts of the management are now directed towards the formation of a stable endowment fund. Mr. Sinclair, the chairman, exerted himself creditably on Wednesday night to promote the interests of the last tuition, which is an honour to the trade the destitute members of which it seeks to relieve.

ASYLUM FOR IDIOTS.—One of the wards in the new asylum will be called "Dickenson Ward," the late Mr. Thomas Dickenson having bequeathed £2000, free of duty, to the building fund. Mr. C Dixon has given a donation of £100 10s. There are now 170 candidates for admission, of whom only 15 can be received at present, owing to the want of accommodation in the present building.

ASYLUM FOR DEAF AND DUMB CHILDREN.—On Monday the annual meeting and election of children into this institution was held at the London Tavern; Mr. William Nottage, the treasurer, in the chair. The annual statement of receipts and expenditure was read, by which it appeared that a sum of £10,605 2s. 1d. had been received from subscriptions, donations, &c.; while the expenditure for the board and tuition of 288 children, and the other incidental expenses of the establishment, amounted to £7374 2s. 1d. A sum of £1833 10s. had been paid for the purchase of £2000 three per Cent. Consols, and the balance in the bankers' hands was £849 10s. A legacy of £1000 from the late Thomas Dickenson, of Holloway, was announced; and it was also stated that the late Miss Severn, of Islington, had by the proceedings of the past year, from which it appeared that the total number of members entered since the establishment of the society, in January, 1850, was 721, the total amount of subscriptions being upwards of £800. £320 had been paid to the widows or orphans of 8 deceased members during the past year. The annual and incidental working expenses of the fund, printing, secretary's salary, &c., a balance of nearly £400 was invested in the funds in the names of the trustees.

FEMALE EMIGRATION SOCIETY.—On Tuesday a large body of the members and friends of the Female Education Society proceeded to Gravesend, off which place the Euphrates, Captain Munro, 850 tons, was lying, to bid farewell to the twentieth party of emigrants about to proceed to Sydney under the auspices of the above society. The number of girls to be sent out with this vessel is 60, of whom 55 embarked on Tuesday, and the other five will rejoin them on its arrival at Plymouth. They are all young women of the most unexceptionable character, their age ranging from 15 to thirty, the majority of them having been employed as domestic servants. The Hon. Mr. Sidney Herbert, M.P., addressed the emigrants in feeling terms.

DESTITUTION IN THE CITY OF LONDON.—This parish during the present and preceding year has been the scene of several acts of benevolence and kindly feelings towards the working classes. On Monday last 680 children of the schools were assembled to have buns, milk, and cheese, and to be granted with the other acts of the Anglo Iastern. They were subsequently addressed by the clergy, and sang hymns.

SOUTHWARK SOUP-KITCHEN.—Under the auspices of some of the respectable inhabitants of the district, a soup-kitchen has been recently opened in Gravel-lane, Southwark, where about 500 of the very poor resident in such a quart of soup, half a loaf of bread, and a small portion of beef. The soup-kitchen is at present open only one day in the week; but even this relief has become most seasonable to some of the many thousands of destitute families who swarm in the numerous lanes and courts of Lambeth and Southwark. Mr. Gilbert A'Beckett, the police magistrate of the district, has seconded the efforts of the managing committee. A benevolent lady has given £5 to the treasurer, Mr. Brady, 86, Blackfriars-road; and the committee trust that the charity of the public will enable them to keep the soup-kitchen open during the inclement winter months.

PREVENTION OF MENDICANCY AND DESTITUTION IN THE METROPOLIS.—On Thursday a very numerously attended public meeting was held at the London Tavern—the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor in the chair—at which it was resolved, that the plan devised and detailed by the committee of the Lowestreet-square Kitchen for preventing destitution and mendicancy in the metropolis, which it was proposed to extend to the city of London, was well designed to accomplish the end in view, and the gentlemen present pledged themselves to assist in carrying it out. Other resolutions of a similar tendency were also carried, and a list of subscriptions amounting to about £5000, with a promise from one gentleman to make up £5000 more, was declared at the meeting.

PUBLIC BATHS AND WASHHOUSES.—The committee for promoting the establishment of baths and washhouses for the labouring classes have published returns proving the complete success of their labours. During the year ended last Christmas there have been in the metropolitan districts 447,242 bathers, and 132,231 washers; the receipts from the former were £9141 8s. 6d., and from the latter £1498 19s. 2d.—making the total receipts £10,649 7s. 8d. The names of the establishments are Goldbath-square, St. Martin's-street, Wilderness Row, Queen-square, Westminster, St. Margaret and St. John (Westminster), Queen-square, Bloomsbury, Glasshouse-street, Golden-lane, Whitecross-street, Tabernacle-walk, Whitechapel, Shoreditch, Kingsland, Goulston-street, Whitechapel, Bethnal-green, Hoxton, Old-street, Pancras, Kentish Town, Hampstead, Islington, Clerkenwell, Finsbury, Paddington, Kensington, Chelsea, Pimlico, Westminster, Parliament-street, Horsleydown, Tooley-street, Kent-road, Deptford, Greenwich, Rotherhithe, Peckham, Camberwell, Lambeth, Vauxhall, Battersea, Wandsworth, Hammersmith, Fulham, Chiswick, Brentford, Hounslow, Kingston, Richmond, Twickenham, Hampton, Walton, Chertsey, Egham, Windsor, Eton, Uxbridge, Harrow, Edgware, Hendon, Barnet, Enfield, Waltham Cross, Hertford, Ware, Hoddesdon, Watford, Rickmansworth

REMOVAL OF THE INSCRIPTION "LIBERTE, EGALITE, FRATERNITE."

SKETCHES IN PARIS.

THE mutations in Paris, consequent upon the election of Louis Napoleon, follow in sufficient variety to furnish our Artists with a succession of incidents for their sketch-books. The French capital is constant in nothing but perpetual change; so that, in following the example of time, there is abundant exercise for the graphic art. The first of the incidents here pictured is ERASURE OF THE WORDS "LIBERTE, EGALITE, FRATERNITE," FROM THE PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

The instructions communicated by the Minister of the Interior, in his circular to the Prefect of the Seine, to efface the above words, and of which a decree of the Provisional Government had ordered the inscription some days after the Revolution of February, is now in progress of execution. Those three revolutionary watchwords had, in fact, been erased last year from the principal entrance to the Elysée, and the ords "République Fran[illegible]

The Times correspondent relates a characteristic exercise of this sweeping instruction:—

"There is, I believe, only one public monument in Paris—the Ecole de Droit—where the workmen employed in effacing that inscription will have a double duty. They will have to interfere with the 'Liberalism' of two generations. Immediately under the coat of yellow paint which covered the façade of the building, and on which time and the inclemency of the seasons have done their work, may still be traced, above the modern device, the following words, inscribed by order of the commune of Paris during the Reign of Terror—'Liberté, Egalité, Fraternité, Unité, Indivisibilité de la République Française!' As the effacing of the inscription of 1848 is not now by means of whitewash or paint, but by erasure, both the inscriptions will disappear at the same moment."

The next scene is altogether of a gayer character, being the

on Tuesday night (last week), when the Prince President attended a private performance of Meyerbeer's opera of the "Prophète," to which had been invited the Ministry, the army, and all the dignitaries of the Republic, including the mayors and delegates from the provinces. The performance was to commence at eight o'clock precisely, and a little after seven a moderate crowd besieged the Boulevards from the Madeleine to the Rue Lepelletier, and lined the streets of the Faubourg St. Honoré and La Concorde on either side; the Gardes Municipales en attendant the arrival of the head of the Republic. There were no illuminations, except at the mouth of the Rue Lepelletier, where the corner house, opposite the café Riche, presented the significant number 7,404,592, in brilliant jets of gas, over the doorway. Similar jets of gas, disposed conically, were affixed to posts at each corner of the street, and at the entry of the theatre. A little before eight o'clock the carriage of the President, preceded, surrounded, and followed by a detachment of cuirassiers, made its appearance, while there were scattered cries, on either side, of "Vive Napoléon!" as the vehicle approached the theatre. The President, on descending, was received by M. Rocqueplan, the manager, who had awaited his arrival at the steps of the portico.

Before Louis Napoleon had arrived the theatre was quite full, and when he entered his box the whole assembly stood up to do him honour. The acclamations were loud and general, the Prince President acknowledging the compliment. He was attired in the uniform of Lieutenant-General, with the grand cordon of the Legion of Honour. He was attended by his uncle, Marshal Jerome Bonaparte, Marshal Excelmans, the Ministers of War, the Interior, and Public Instruction. The General of the army in Paris (Magnan), the General-in-Chief of the army (Lawestine), Colonel Vieyra, and the other Ministers were stationed in immediate contiguity. The box occupied by Louis Napoleon, to the right of the entrance to the amphitheatre, almost in the middle of the salle, was made out of three or four of the ordinary boxes, which had been displaced for the purpose. It was disposed in the form of a gorgeous dais, with velvet hangings and gold ornaments, and projected over a portion of the amphitheatre. The dais was surmounted by the huge effigy of an eagle with spread wings, in gold—an object recently discovered, among other relics of the Empire, in the possession of M. Vallette, an amateur of curiosities and articles of vertu and antiquity. The extra drop scene, which ordinarily divides two of the acts of the "Prophète," was replaced by a rideau de circonstance, representing France by the allegory of a woman seated on the globe, and adorned with allusions to December 20 and 21. Among other figures were flying angels, blowing the trumpet of renown, and carrying standards with the motto "Vox Populi vox Dei!" In the background was another gigantic eagle, with spread wings, and eyes fixed upon the sun. Around the amphitheatre immense tricoloured banners were attached to the columns, with the inscripton "Honneur et Patrie." Upon the numerous banners hung in the salle and the foyer more than 120 eaglets were painted. The audience comprised a great display of military uniforms. There were comparatively few ladies, and many of these were attired in the fashion of the Empire. One of the most conspicuous for the beauty of her costume was the Princess Mathilde, cousin of Louis Napoleon, who occupied the box usually allotted to the President. In the premières loges de balcon were the Ambassadors of England and Turkey, the Ministers of Russia, Naples, Denmark, Spain, Prussia, America, &c.; in the amphitheatre stalls, the generals and colonels of the army; in the orchestra stalls, the mayors and delegates; while the wives of the Ambassadors and other ladies of distinction occupied conspicuous places and rivalled each other in the splendour and variety of their toilets, most of which, however, were more or less, especially in what concerned the coiffure, style de l'Empire. The coup d'œil, however, although the salle was lighted "au jour" with numberless lustres and candelabra, was as oppressive as it was gorgeous.

The execution of the opera of the "Prophète," the instrumental part excepted, was by no means above par. The principal artistes were Madame Tedesco (Fidès), Mdlle. Poinsot (Berthe), M. Gueymard (Jean de Leyden), and M. Obin (Zacharie). The sole token of enthusiasm was that to the pas from "Vert-vert," introduced by the new and successful dancer Mdlle. Priora, in the skating scene. The only real effect, however, was produced after the third act, when, the curtain falling, M. Girard waved his bow, and the band struck up alternately two airs from the opera of Gretry, "La Caravane du Caire," which were always performed when the great Napoleon went to the Opera, "La Victoire est à nous" (a chorus) and the triumphal march. These antique tunes roused the generals, veterans, and mayors, and elevated the spirits of the soldiers. The sensation was profound, and its expression in keeping. The President listened to the opera throughout with studied attention, making very few remarks to those about him. He remained until the end, and, as he rose to depart, was cheered unanimously, and again returned the compliment with repeated obeisances. At his sortie he was received much in the same manner as on his arrival.

Besides the above scenes, we have engraved a specimen of the coinage which has just been issued, and which bears "the image and superscription" of the President.

A BRISK GALE AT SEA."—PAINTED BY BACKHUYSEN.—JUST ADDED TO THE NATIONAL GALLERY

FINE ARTS.

A BRISK GALE AT SEA. BY BACKHUYSEN.

The accompanying Engraving is from the third of the recent additions to the National Gallery. It is a bequest of the late Charles Bredell, Esq., lately deceased, and was exhibited last season among the works of old masters at the British Institution. Possessing in an eminent degree the best characteristics of Backhuysen, it has all his neat and finished, yet free, execution—his peculiar tint in cloud and sky—the exact proportion of his ships in receding perspective, and their ease and grace of position. The boat in the foreground contains, besides the ordinary Dutch sailors, certain cavaliers, habited in the slouched hat and cloak of the period. Their course is shaped so as to intercept one of the men-of-war following in each other's wake. The picture, from this incident, has been supposed to represent the champion of the United Provinces, De Ruyter, going on board his ship. In the carefully-drawn wave-forms we see the result of a frequent practice with Backhuysen. We are told that, whenever he could procure men sufficiently resolute to second his professional enthusiasm, he would go to sea in stormy weather, to store his mind with grand images, and recruit his portfolio with studies made direct from nature, amid scenes that would have filled any other heart with terror. The truth and technical knowledge displayed in his pictures procured for this master a large share of public patronage. His drawings, even, were in great request, and often fetched as much as 100 florins.

No painter was ever held in greater honour by crowned heads than Backhuysen. The King of Prussia was one of his visitors. The Czar Peter the Great, in particular, delighted to see him paint, and frequently attempted to copy vessels which he had designed.

Backhuysen was born at Embden in 1631, and died in 1709.

MEETING OF OPERATIVE ENGINEERS AT ST. MARTIN'S HALL.

On Monday there was a very numerous meeting of the engineers and machinists now thrown out of employment by the resolution of the masters to resist the demands of the Amalgamated Society. St. Martin's Hall, Long-acre, was crowded to excess. Viscount Goderich and several other gentlemen were present, but took no part in the proceedings, and his Lordship and his friends left before they were concluded. Mr. Musto, the chairman of the Executive Council, being absent from indisposition, Mr. Thomas Cormack, one of the members, took the chair. Mr George Usher moved and Mr. Potts seconded, the following resolution :—"That many of the employers of London and Manchester having closed their workshops, this meeting is of opinion that their conduct is unjust and particularly oppressive to non-members and labourers, and pledges itself to use every exertion in obtaining subscriptions in behalf of all who are thrown out of employment." Mr. W. Newton was the next speaker. He denounced articles that had been published in a daily and in a weekly paper, attributing the authorship in the latter to Mr Sidney Smith, the secretary to the Masters' Association. He denied that the council had sanctioned in any manner the demand that laborers working at machines should be dismissed. The effect of the resolve of the masters would be to drive the workmen to establish workshops for themselves, and he was quite confident as to the success of their labours. All the workmen wanted was for the masters to meet them and discuss amicably their differences; but the masters refused, and discharged the men who came to them as deputations. The workmen had not struck; they did not want strikes; they never contemplated strikes; they repudiated emphatically such a course; but in this case the masters had taken the initiative by discharging themselves. Other societies, such as the boiler-makers and moulders, were making common cause with the engineers. The employers had made no provision for non-society men. The masters could not employ the places of 12,000 skilled industrious men by unskilled labourers, and must have the old hands back. The workmen had the offer of capital at four or five per cent., and of factories with the full complement of tools. There was every reason to hope that the men who were out might be kept without touching the general fund, as the number was fewer than was imagined. Many masters in London were keeping open their workshops. Less than a day's wages of the members had been taken out of work. Several noblemen and gentlemen had offered to become trustees for the funds to be collected, and they had now on the platform Lord Goderich and several other gentlemen, whose every-day life was to find out the evils of society, and to apply a remedy for them With the sanction of such men they had a fair right to go before the public for support. He called upon the men out of employ to act with moderation, to be prudent and discreet, to do what was just in the eye of God and law, and many masters would be glad to lay hold of a few members of the council. There must be no threats, no intimidation—the employers were welcome to picket the club-houses of the mechanics; their meetings were open, whilst those of the masters were with closed doors. After a few words from Mr. Barrie, Mr. Braddon moved, and Mr. John Reid seconded, the following resolution :—"As a means of removing the evils which beset the condition of working men in relation to the unjust conduct of employers, we recommend the principle of self-employment on a co-operative basis; and this meeting is of opinion that workshops should be immediately commenced by the workmen themselves, in order that the business of the country may be proceeded with." Mr. Reid stated that fifteen years ago, when the workmen were in a hostile position with the masters, the latter treated them with courtesy, but now the employers had a secretary who stood in the way of accommodation. A workman having risen and stated that he was a non-society man, but that his heart was in the present movement if they would support him, the chairman declared that the society would support him and all like him, although they were not members. Resolutions were carried, and three cheers given for the press; but the proposition for three cheers to Mr. Newton was only partially responded to, and there was hissing mixed with it.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

Monday was the opening of Hilary Term, the first day falling on Sunday. There were only two motions in the Court of Queen's Bench; and the new trial paper, containing a list of twenty-six cases, was thus disposed of without. The Court refused a rule to show cause for a new trial in the case of Baker, the parliamentary agent, v. Mr. Gregory, and the latter is therefore rendered responsible for the costs in the petition against the return of Mr. Reynolds for Dublin.

The January general quarterly Middlesex sessions were resumed on Monday, at the Guildhall, Westminster, by adjournment from Clerkenwell. Mr. Serjeant Adams, the assistant-Judge, addressed the grand jury, and pointed out the great advantages that had followed the restoration of the ancient jurisdiction of that court: a saving of £3500 to the country had already been made, and much time and inconvenience saved to jurors and witnesses. Many minor criminal cases disposed of relieved the business of the Central Criminal Court materially. The calendar contained 83 cases—9 of misdemeanour, and 74 of larceny.

Before Mr. Justice Erle, in the Bail Court, on Tuesday, the action brought by Mr. Abraham (agent of the Duke of Norfolk), the eminent architect who projected the Wes.minster improvements, against Mr. Wyld, M P., the geographer, of Charing-cross, and proprietor of the "Great Globe," in Leicester-square was tried. The plaintiff sought to recover £430 for work done in making drawings and plans, and in overseeing the erection of the "Great Globe" but ding, Mr. Wyld paid £200 into court, and denied his liability to the remainder. Most of the defendant gave evidence in the case, which was one of a complicated account and disputed authority. The jury gave a verdict for the plaintiff for £75 damages and the sum paid into court.

At the sittings in Banco, on Wednesday, in the Court of Queen's Bench, Lord Campbell delivered judgment in respect to the rating of the United Service Institution by the parochial authorities of St. Martin's-in-the Fields The Court unanimously confirmed the assessment of the parish and of the quarter sessions; the exemption claimed by the institution under the 6th and 7th Vict., cap 36, as a scientific and literary society, was overruled.

Miss Hoare moved in person, in the Court of Exchequer, on Wednesday, for a rule to set aside the verdict returned in the action for libel by her self against the proprietor of the Morning Herald, on the ground of misdirection on the part of the Lord Chief Baron, of rejection of admissible evidence, and of reception of inadmissable evidence. The Judges unanimously refused the rule.

PLAINTS IN COUNTY COURTS.—It appears from Parliamentary papers, that in 1848, 1849, and 1850, there were 1,219,995 plaints entered in county courts 427,681 in 1848, 369,191 in 1849, and 376,753 in 1850.

THE MIDDLE TEMPLE.—The undermentioned gentlemen have been called to the bench of the Honourable Society of the Middle Temple:—William Ellis, esq., Q.C.; Graham Willmore, Esq., Q.C.; Frederick William Sadd, Esq., Q.C.; James Anderson, Esq., Q.C.; Hugh Hill, Esq., Q.C.; and William Rodon Rennalls, Esq.

LEGAL STATISTICS.—It appears from returns to Parliament, that in 1849 there were 36,734 writs issued by the Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer, and 40,043 by the Exchequer. These are stated to be on means process; while in the county courts in the same year there were 395,191 plaints entered.

"JOHN DOE AND RICHARD ROE."—The Common Law Commissioners recommend that these celebrated legal characters in actions of ejectment should cease to exist. The proceedings, they state, ought to be simple and speedy, but they are neither the one nor the other They are at present because there are several fictions; "for example, the existence of Richard Roe, the lease to John Doe, the entry of John Doe, the trespass by Richard Roe, and in some cases the original writ, none of which things really exists, and none of which ought to be stated."

ELECTION INTELLIGENCE.

PLYMOUTH.—In addition to the four candidates for representing the borough, viz. Lord Ebrington, Mr. R. Palmer, Mr. R. P. Collier, and Mr. Brailsford, it is rumored that a gentleman connected with one of the county members will offer himself to the notice of the electors whenever a dissolution takes place.—Exeter Gazette.

STAMFORD.—At the annual soirée of the Mechanics' Institution, Mr. John Parker and Mr J. A. Roebuck, the members for the borough, were present, and addressed the auditory on the question of education; the former stating, that, if the people were educated, he would not ask how or by whom it was done. Mr Roebuck commented on Lord John Russell's reply to the Manchester deputation—that the time had not yet come, after the Reform Bill had been passed 20 years. He hoped the time was about to arrive when the rich intellect of the country, the real philanthropy of the people, would come and put down all sectarian opposition; and that we should not need the Mechanics' Institution to instruct, but a national system of education to elevate, direct, and render the population worthy of the name of Englishmen.

A letter from Rome, in the Cattolico of Genoa, has the following :—"It is said that in his autograph letter to the Holy Father, Prince Louis Napoleon has avowed his sentiments of filial devotedness in the strongest terms, and Cardinal Antonelli will make every effort to put down Socialism. It is added that an [illegible] has already waited upon the Prince, had a long conversation with [illegible] the Prince and to him, 'Understand me well; I am of the religion of the Pope: I know I am only here provisionally, but I hope I shall remain here long enough to stifle the two monsters of Socialism and of the Red.'"

The number of recruits enlisted and approved for service in the Royal Marines during the six months ending December, 1851, was 286.

MUSIC.

THE MADRIGAL SOCIETY.

The anniversary festival of this ancient society, established in 1741, was celebrated on Thursday night, in Freemasons' Hall; General Lord Ashburn, the president, in the chair. The selection comprised Croft's "We will rejoice!" Palestrina's "By the waters of Babylon," "In thee O Lord;" Nicholson's "Spring comes again." Wilbye's "When Chloris heard," Thibault's "Tother morning," Marchi's "Upon a bank," Asa Warenio's "O Stay, limpid stream;" Gibbons' "O that the learned poets;" Byrd's "Come let us sing;" Pilkington's "I sigh still doom'd;" Farmer's "To take the air," Bennett's "Thyrsis, keepeat thou?" and Saville's "Waits."

The execution of the above pieces was generally steady and artistic, and those madrigals which were gone over a second time experienced the benefit of the repetition. Palestrina's motet for four voices (1570) is a gorgeous strain of rich yet simple harmony. Dr. Croft's anthem might have been spared, as two ecclesiastical works in succession were scarcely in accordance with a madrigalian selection. Wilbye's "When Chloris heard" was the gem of the scheme—it is a magnificent conception. The melody of Thibaut, King of Navarre, is to be found in Dr. Burney's "History of Music;" but it was a mistake to include it amongst standard madrigals, merely because it has been harmonised in modern times. O. Gibbons' "Silver Swan" was a great treat.

Upwards of 100 persons were at the banquet, and the gallery was filled with ladies The choir comprised, after it was organised, when "Non Nobis Domine" had been beautifully given, 10 cantos, 15 altos, 23 tenors, and 42 bassos—in all 90 voices.

GENERAL CAVAIGNAC.

The following correspondence has been published. It arose out of a letter from Madame Odier to M. Morny, requesting an order of admission to the prison of Ham, in order to have the marriage of her daughter and General Cavaignac performed there. The Minister wrote the following reply, of which the date appears to have been the 16th or 16th of December:

"Madame,—The President of the Republic found it necessary to take very severe measures in the first moments, and could not yield to personal considerations, but he has expressed to me the desire, immediately after the re-establishment of tranquillity, to restore General Cavaignac to liberty, whose services to the cause of order and society he has not forgotten, and whom he does not confound with the conspirators who meditated the ruin of his power.

"Knowing the opinion of all your family, and desiring to give it a proof of his friendly interest, the charges me to say that he would see with pain the ceremony of the marriage of your daughter with the honourable General saddened by the walls of a prison, and to send you an order to set him at liberty. I need not say with what pleasure I execute this commission, and I request you to accept the assurance of my profound respect. (Signed) "MORNY."

To that letter General Cavaignac replied as follows:—

"Fort of Ham, Dec. 17, 1851.

"Monsieur le Ministre,—Madame Odier, about to be my mother-in-law, has this instant sent me the order for my liberation. That order is accompanied by letter which you have addressed to her.

"If the Governor of the Fort of Ham had received the order pure and simple to set me at the gates of that prison, I would also purely and simply have resumed my liberty, which has been illegally snatched from me. But the order which relieves me is accompanied by a letter which you could not have considered as trifling, and which fall naturally to be communicated to me. The commentary which it expresses, and the motives which it ascribes to the power in whose name you act, are not of a nature to be accepted by me. Certainly no one has suffered, and does suffer, more than I from the sad delays to my reunion with Mademoiselle Odier; but I have no apprehension that even she would consider that a reason for accepting my liberation. I ought to leave this place, Monsieur le Ministre, for no reason but that I have gone nothing to merit me here. I have no desire to be a prisoner here in spite of those who have illegally arrested me, but it rests with me, and it concerns my honour, to accept of no compromise inconsistent with the duty I owe to myself.

"In consequence, Monsieur le Ministre, I have the honour to declare to you that I shall remain here till Friday, the 19th of the month. At that date I shall deliver to the governor of the fort the order which I retain. If he has received from the contrary, I shall be entitled to say, and to consider it admitted by the Government itself, that, as I said above, I got out of prison on this sole ground—that there is no lawful reason for retaining me here.

(Signed) "CAVAIGNAC."

It will be seen that the letter, intimating the General's intention to remain till the 19th, is dated the 17th; it could not have been received by M. de Morny till the 18th; and on the 19th, the very day announced for the exodus, he wrote the following:

"General,—In transmitting to Madame Odier the order for your liberation, I had no other object than to do an agreeable thing to a family which I love and respect. I never thought of anything else.

"If I allow myself to speak of the sentiments of the President of the Republic, it is (and you know it, General, better than anybody), that, if the great political acts whose object is the safety of a country sometimes impose stern necessities, they do not efface the sentiments of esteem which may be entertained for an adversary, and do not forbid the expression of them.

"You will understand that I do not reply to what you have done me the honour to say regarding the illegality of your arrest, and that I limit myself to congratulations that the date selected by you, 19th December, is so near at hand.

(Signed) "MORNY."

CHESS.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

UN ABONNÉ, Chester.—Every move in the game between Mr L. wenthal and the Reading allies is correctly given. We strongly suspect you are not imperfectly acquainted with our notation. Make yourself thoroughly conversant with that before attempting to play or score games.

S D. Your solution is incorrect, because at the fourth move Black need not return his King to K's 4th, but may advance his K. Pawn.

BRIDGE.—In Enigma 697, Mate is effected by—1. B to K sq. 2. B to Q B 3d. 3 Kt to K B 7th. 4. B to K sq (ch). 5 P to Kt 4th. Mate.

E C.—We are gratified to hear of the unqualified success attending the experiment of starting a new Chess Club at Halifax. When convenient, we shall be glad if you will forward the rules, list of officials, &c.

WATERLOO.—You will find a numerous and highly flourishing Chess Club in Brussels, at the Café Suisse, Place de la Monnaie, where the leading British, French, and English papers may be seen; and where, for the small subscription of twenty francs a for six months, the members have the exclusive use of four rooms, and may enjoy chess playing at all hours daily.

LEX.—Every facility for joining the excellent Chess Club, the St George's, will be afforded you, if you address a line to the secretary, R Longbottom, Esq., No 8, Cavendish-square. Subscription for town members, three guineas per annum; for country members, one guinea.

M F, Travellers' Club.—The Cercle des Echecs of Paris assembles at the Café de la Regence, and the Chess Club of Vienna at Neuner's Coffee-house. There is a Chess Club at Lloyd's, at Pesth, and Breslau, but we are unacquainted with their "whereabouts."

A G.—The solution of Judy's Enigma, No 705, begins with—1. K to Q B 8th; 2. K to Q 6th. The rest you will easily discover.

AN AMATEUR, Stonehouse.—No, he must sacrifice his Pawns

J A W, Hunslet.—We stated lately that both Jaenisch's "Nouvelle Analyse" and Bilguer's "Handbuch" might be got through Williams and Norgate the foreign booksellers. The price of the former is, we believe, that of the latter about 15s.

TYRO.—Owing, we believe, to some differences of opinion between the conductors, and the perturbed state of things in France, the Fenetre Chess per odical, La Régence terminates with the present volume.

ETONENSIS.—The article on the "Bishop's Gambit," now preparing by the two great Russian players, will be placed at our disposal for pub lication when complete d

R W.—We cannot countenance problems with forbidden conditions. To stipulate that White is not to Queen his Pawn, and yet permit him to call for a Rook, is a very poor quibble REPLY.—Your analysis of Problem 415 is incorrect. Look at the position again. In the solution No 414, Black's 3d move is Kt to Q 3d.

SOLUTIONS OF PROBLEM No 415 by P H, of Birmingham, M N O, Fenax, M T, are correct

NATIONAL SPORTS.

The coursing business of the ensuing week is only of local interest, the fixtures, with the exception of Wolverhampton, being in unfashionable quarters, and the prizes of small value. They stand thus: Tuesday, Winnersgh (Lancashire), and Wolverhampton; Wednesday, Wombersley; Thursday, Ditton Priors (Shropshire), and Carlisle (Scot. Ass.). We see only one steeple-chase appointment; but, as that will be in the neighbourhood of Sutton, the metropolitans will have a treat; it is fixed for Thursday, and promises good sport.

GOLD VASE, MADE BY SEYMOUR AND SON, of Gerrard-street, Soho. This vase bears enamelled portraits of the Queen and Prince Albert, in imitation of cameos. The transparent enamel colours on the body of the vase are the red or ruby-coloured enamel, green, and blue; in the neck is the turquoise-coloured enamel. These colours are all made by the exhibitors, and may safely challenge comparison with anything of the kind ever produced, the ruby colour in particular is perfect. The portraits are painted by J. Haslem. It should be added, that in the Great Exhibition Building the ruby red was injured by the yellow tone given to the light by its passing through the canvas with which the roof was covered; this is a remark which will also apply to many other colours: the light in the North Gallery would, doubtless, have been much more suitable for goldsmiths' work.

TOILET-GLASS, MADE FOR HER GRACE THE DUCHESS OF SUTHERLAND. W. POTTS, BIRMINGHAM.

We believe this toilet-glass is one of the largest pieces of ornamental casting in bronze of this genre executed in England. Its design and workmanship reflect the highest credit on its spirited manufacturer. The idea evidently sought to be carried out is, a couple of nereids, sitting on marine plants, arranging their toilet. The upper part of the frame is enriched with the monogram, motto, and coronet of the noble Lady. Two herons also grace the top, holding in their beaks chains, whence are pendent bruleo-parfums of elegant form. Springing from foliage of the lower part of the design are two pairs of branches for wax lights, partaking of the same floral character; between these, supported on very elegant scroll-work, are three perfume-bottles of cut glass. The figures of the nereids are of Parian.

WOOD CARVING, "SPRING." BY WALLIS, OF LOUTH.

This magnificent group of spring birds and flowers we have commented upon in a former notice of "Wood Carving in the Great Exhibition." For truthfulness of character, variety of objects, and delicacy of workmanship, it was perhaps without a rival in the Exhibition. In the opinion of many, a greater variety of size in the objects represented would have improved the group; but, embodying the characteristics of spring when only flowers are to be met with, the artist was prevented from availing himself of the varied forms which the introduction of fruit would have placed at his disposal.

THE Crystal Palace may at last be said to be cleared out, and in the course of the week every package will be gone, all the partitions removed, and the vast area open from end to end. In a few days the public will no doubt be admitted once more into the interior. They will be able to contrast the present deserted aspect with what it was a few months ago, and to estimate how far the gigantic structure is worth preservation, and what purposes of utility, amusement, and instruction it may serve. It seems very desirable that the admission should be rendered as free as possible.

PRESENTS TO THE POLICE IN CHARGE OF THE CRYSTAL PALACE.—In money France, £228 12s.; Great Britain, £16 2s. 6d.; Portugal, £5; North Germany £5; Canada, £3 3s.; China, £1; East India (to Superintendent Pearce), £30 Total, £288 17s. 6d. The other presents have been:—Great Britain—1 shawl, 4 bonnets, 1 penknife, 1 china cup and saucer, 1 silver vinigrette, 1 silver watch, 12 silver teaspoons, and 1 metal teapot. France—1 bronze ornament and 2 silver snuff-boxes. America—4 silver watches, 3 silver pencilcases, and 4 Russian leather pocket-books. Switzerland 6 silver watches. Russia 1 diamond pin. Zollverein—1 wooden snuff-box. The whole distributed, with the above exception, to 11 sergeants and 73 constables.

THE TRADES' COLLECTION.—Under the care of Lieut. Tyler, the Trades' Collection is making rapid progress, and, besides the large and valuable number of objects already brought together, the most commendable spirit of co-operation has been evinced by the public, and the most libera. promises of contribution have been received. There is little doubt that this trades' collection will be preserved from becoming a mere useless show buried under glass cases. Every means will, it is said, be used to render it a really practical thing, the rendezvous of all novelties, accessible to experimentalists, and freed from the deaden ing influences of an antiquarian character.

STATISTICS OF THE GREAT EXHIBITION.—Sir Stafford Northcote is preparing or the Royal Commission an elaborate report, in which a large and highly interesting mass of statistics connected with the Exhibition will be included. There will be little of novelty in the task which he has undertaken, for the whole subject has been already so thoroughly explored by the press, that hardly anything remains to be revealed. Perhaps never before has the light of publicity been so fully shed upon the details of a great undertaking, and much of its success is unquestionably attributable to this circumstance. Almost the only point on which we still remain much in the dark is the statement of expenditure. With reference to that, and especially the appropriation of those portions of the original surplus which have already been absorbed, it is to be hoped that no mistaken notions of official secrecy will interfere to prevent a full disclosure. To allay the remotest suspicion of jobbing, perfect frankness and candour should be preserved. The Royal Commission have, we are sure, no reason to fear a detailed financial statement.

OLYMPIC THEATRE.

RED RUFUS; or, Harlequin Fact, Fiction and Fancy," the pantomime at this theatre runs its merry round nightly; and Mr. Nelson Lee's grotesque scenes are highly relished by the holiday folk. Our Artist has chosen a scene from the opening immediately before the transformation for the harlequinade. Here is the argument—

The fairy court being called together to meet the fairy Queen, Fancy, arrives in her regal car of state, and holds a council. She is determined to protect Sir Walter Tyrrell, chief of the frog army, who is in love with the fair maid Alice, against Red Rufus, his Royal rival, who has resolved to carry her off at curfew time. Tyrrel secretly determines on revenge, and conceals himself in the presence-chamber in the palace for the purpose of arranging his plans. The King and Prince Harry arrive. The King exclaims—

Harry! the morn, as I lay in my bed,
A curious dream came into my head;
Methought to me these words were said,
"Rufus. Rufus. Rufus Red.
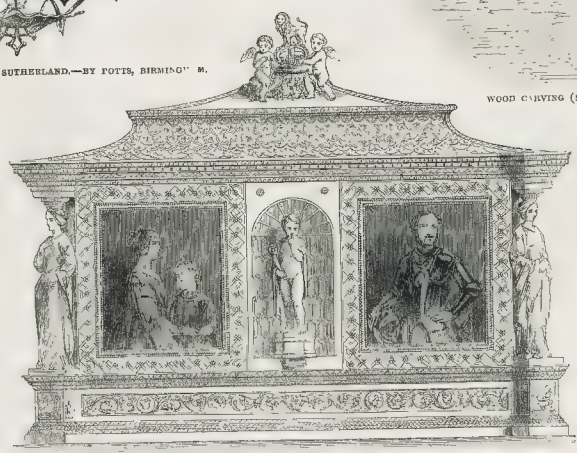
To-morrow will your liege be sped."

Curfew time arrives—all is dark and quiet; Tyrrel, having appointed to carry off his love, is already waiting to receive her at Harrow-on-the-Hill. The fair Alice makes her appearance, and by some mistake falls into the arms of the gay young Monarch. Their flight brings us back to the palace. The hunters arrive, when the King resolves to have a day's sport. He takes leave of Alice, who is in great distress; Tyrrel, however, has an interview with her, and produces a silver arrow which the fairy Blue Bell had placed in his path. We next witness the King alone in the New Forest, having in the chase lost the courtiers and his train of sportsmen. Tyrrel shoots the silver arrow, which hits his Majesty in the eye. At this moment Mark Bull's-Eye enters in search of Alice, who also makes her appearance and rushes into the arms of her lover.



HER MAJESTY'S CINQUE-CENTO JEWEL-CASE,—DESIGNED BY GRUNER; MANUFACTURED BY ELKINGTON.

The last accounts of Dr. Barth are dated Kuka September 1: he was to start in a week, to continue his travels in Central Africa. He complains of a deficiency of financial means to carry out the objects of his interesting inquiries. He states that he should not follow the Murzuk route as far as the Well of Kashiery, but he would proceed to the north-east immediately after leaving Ingagemi, on to Bornou.

THE MOST ANCIENT FOSSIL REPTILE YET DISCOVERED.

THE TELERPETON ELGINENSE; OR, ANCIENT FOSSIL REPTILE OF SCOTLAND.

(The most ancient fossil reptile hitherto discovered.)

OUR readers are aware that the remains of reptiles abound in the secondary deposits: that is, in the chalk, wealden, oolite, lias, and new red sandstone, throughout England and the Continent; and that the oviparous quadrupeds appear to have been the principal and highest orders of vertebrated animals that inhabited the lands, rivers, and seas during those vast geological periods. Of late years, remains of peculiar types of reptiles have been found in deposits of yet more ancient date; but until last year no vestiges of any reptile had ever been observed in the extensive series of deposits called the old red or Devonian formation, and which belong to a period incalculably more ancient than the coal measures. At a late meeting of the Geological Society, Dr. Mantell read a communication from Captain Lambart Brickenden, giving an account of the discovery in the crystalline yellowish sandstone of the old red, near Elgin, in Morayshire, of a series of 34 footprints of a turtle or tortoise, extending across a slab of rock several feet in length; and the subsequent exhumation from the same strata of the remains of the skeleton of a small four-footed reptile, by Mr. Patrick Duff, of Elgin. The latter fossil was exhibited to the society and the annexed Engraving represents this most interesting relic. Dr Mantell gave to the meeting a minute anatomical description of the structure of the skeleton, comparing it with those of recent lizards and salamanders. He stated that it resembled in some of its osteological characters the small lizards and other batrachians; and that the original was of peculiar type, neither a lacertian nor a salamander, but presenting characters found in both orders. It was about six or seven inches in length, resembling in its general appearance an aquatic salamander, but with a broader back and longer limbs than the common tritons. It must have been capable of quick progression on the land and in the water. It had a wide compressed tail. Unfortunately the skull is crushed, and there are no traces of the feet so that only the general form and appearance of this creature can be determined. This reptile is the most ancient being of its class which the researches of geology have yet revealed, and Dr. Mantell has given it a name expressive of its remote antiquity, namely, Telerpeton (from τηλε, signifying very remote, and ερπετον, reptile), with the specific name Elginense, from the locality whence it was obtained. Doubtless, other relics of a like nature will ere long be discovered in the same rocks, now that the zeal of collectors is excited by this unexpected event.

INKSTAND PRESENTED TO LIEUTENANT-COLONEL BIDDULPH.

THE officers of the 1st Life Guards have just testified their high respect for Colonel Biddulph, by presenting him with an Inkstand of unique design, and altogether a very appropriate souvenir, on his leaving the regiment. The elegant gift was placed in the hands of the gallant Colonel on Saturday last.

INKSTAND PRESENTED TO LIEUTENANT-COLONEL BIDDULPH, BY HIS BROTHER OFFICERS OF THE 1ST LIFE GUARDS.

The design is very characteristic. The body of the Inkstand is of ebony, artistically mounted in gold and silver. At the angles are circular turrets, serving as sentry-boxes, within which are figures of Life Guardsmen on foot; the tops of the sentry-boxes being surmounted by horses' heads, fully caparisoned. The standishes are a pair of kettle-drums, between which is a trophied group of Guards' helmet, cuirass sword, &c. The four sentries and the horses' heads have been modelled from life; and, to show the minuteness of the accoutrements, each can be removed.

This elegant work has been designed and executed with great taste and finish by Messrs. Phillips Brothers, Cockspur-street. It bears the following inscription:—

To LIEUTENANT-COLONEL BIDDULPH,
From his Brother Officers, on his leaving the 1st Life Guards. October, 1851

HOUSE AT CHELSEA, IN WHICH DIED J. M. W. TURNER, R.A.

THE ROYAL MARIONETTE THEATRE

Is a specimen of those Faust-like dramas which have given the first impulses some men of genius in the dramatic direction. Goethe has related the effect one of these had on his infant mind—how, like the epitome-plays of old Richardson's Bartlemy booth, it excited and stimulated to poetic exertion. The theatre for the purpose of exhibiting an amusement of the sort indicated was opened on Monday, in Adelaide-street, West Strand, the large room of the Adelaide Gallery being well fitted up for the purpose. As we have intimated, the amusement is common in Germany, we may add, it is also prevalent in Italy: and our own Punch's theatre may likewise be accepted as a minor analogue to the larger experiment. A theatre of the kind now attempted was extant in this country about a quarter of a century ago. It was held at the old Argyle Rooms, in Regent-street; and we are told both by Addison and Ben Jonson of previous similar performances. Indeed, Shakspeare several times alludes to "the puppets dallying."

Our concern, however, is with the modern stage—the present Marionette company, who, unlike the rest, is gifted with moving lips and teeth—the others, including even the prima donna, have to speak or squall with a merely painted mouth, like other dolls, those of common wear, not meant for stage exhibition, or to be moved by strings or wires. The interlocutors behind the scenes do their elocution cleverly; and the wooden actor who had to represent Cooke, Kemble, and Kean in one personage was powerfully ventriloquized into by the invisible spirit who lent him the threefold voice. As the three styles were blended in the delivery of each line, the result was especially ludicrous. The extravagances of "Bombastus Furioso" was the principal piece of the evening, and was amusingly contrasted by three grotesque representations of Harlequins in themselves; yet, as before suggested, the pioneers sometimes of mental orestiveness. In the ballet of "Pauline," with which the entertainment concluded, the puppets were made to dance, and in a pas de deux and a hornpipe, the result was neat and effective the latter especially so. It was literally a T. P. Cooke in wood. The performance excited frequent applause from a numerous and fashionable audience.

Our Illustration shows the stage, with the whole of the dramatis personæ.

THE LATE J. M. W. TURNER, R.A.

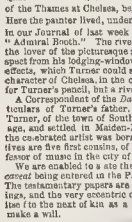
IN the Cottage engraved upon the preceding page our great landscape-painter died, on the 19th of last month. In this suburban retreat Turner had lodged for some years, although his own house, comparatively a mansion, was in Queen Anne-street, Cavendish-square. The cottage is situate upon the banks of the Thames at Chelsea, beyond the old church, towards Cremorne Gardens. Here the painter lived, under the assumed name of Booth, not Brook, as related in our Journal of last week; and he was known among his neighbours as "Admiral Booth." The river-side cottage has little in itself to recommend it to the lover of the picturesque; but the great painter, doubtless, enjoyed the prospect from his lodging-window across the Thames, with its beautiful atmospheric effects, which Turner could so ably transfer to his canvas. Only the old Hatchlike character of Chelsea, in the opposite direction, could have presented few charms for Turner's pencil, but a river bank is ever a poetic object for a painter.

A Correspondent of the Daily News has this week published the following particulars of Turner's father, who was "second son of William and Rebecca Turner, of the town of Southmolton, Devonshire, which place he left at an early age, and settled in Maiden-lane, Covent-garden, London, as a barber. There the celebrated artist was born, and was the only child. His sole surviving relatives are five first cousins, of whom Mr. Thomas Price Turner, an eminent professor of music in the city of Exeter, is one."

We are enabled to a ate that Mr. Turner's will has met with opposition by a caveat being entered in the Prerogative Court against the passing of the same. The testamentary papers are interspersed with drawings and elevations of buildings, and the very eccentric character of the deceased will probably suggested itse f to the next of kin as a ground for questioning the testator's capacity to make a will.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.

SIR DAVID BAIRD, BART.

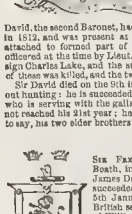


THIS Baronet, the representative of a family of military renown, and himself a soldier, was the eldest son of Robert Baird, Esq., of Newbyth, by Hersey Christian, daughter of David Gavin, Esq., of Lauxton; he was born in 1795, and married, the 10th August, 1821, the Lady Anne Kennedy, eldest daughter of the first Marquis of Ailsa. In 1829 he succeeded his uncle, his father's younger and next brother, Sir David Baird, the first Baronet, the hero of Seringapatam. Sir

David, the second Baronet, had obtained a commission in the Scots Fusilier Guards in 1812, and was present at the battle of Waterloo, where his regiment was attached to formed part of the defence of Hougoumont. That company was officered at the time by Lieut. and Capt. the Hon. Hastings Brudenell Forbes, Ensign Charles Lake, and the subject of this notice, then Ensign Baird; the former of these was killed, and the two latter were severely wounded.

Sir David died on the 9th instant, from the effects of an injury received while out hunting: he is succeeded by his son, now Sir David Baird, the third Baronet, who is serving with the gallant 74th Regiment in the Kaffir war, and who had not reached his 21st year; he is the third son of his father, for, strange and sad to say, his two elder brothers were drowned in 1845.

SIR F. W. DUNBAR, BART.



SIR FREDERICK WILLIAM DUNBAR, second Baronet, of Boath, in the county of Nairn, was the eldest son of Sir James Dunbar, the first Baronet, and was born in 1819. He succeeded to the baronetcy on the decease of his father, the 5th January, 1836. Sir Frederick, who was an officer in the British service, married, in 1842, Caroline Maria, daughter of William Gordon, Esq., but he has had no children. The worthy Baronet died at Nairn, on the 27th ultimo; his brother, Lieutenant James Alexander Dunbar, R.N., inheriting the family honours.

SIR RICHARD ST. GEORGE, BART.

SIR RICHARD BLIGH ST. GEORGE, second Baronet, of Woodgift, in the county of Kilkenny, was the eldest son of Sir Richard St. George, the first Baronet, by his wife Sarah, only daughter of Robert Perse, Esq., of Garbridge, in the county of Galway. He was born the 5th of June, 1765, and succeeded his father as second Baronet in 1789. Sir Richard Bligh St. George took rather a prominent part in political life. As a member of the Irish House of Commons he uncompromisingly opposed the legislative union between Great Britain and Ireland; and he refused an offer from the Government of the day of a peerage to induce him to vote for the measure. He leaves all his death few survivors of the old Irish Parliament Sir Richard married, first, the 10th of February, 1799, Harriet, daughter of the Right Hon. Mr. Justice Kelly, of Kellyville, in the Queen's County, by whom he had three daughters; he married, secondly, in April, 1807, Bridget, eldest daughter of Theophilus Blakeney, Esq., of Abbert, in the county Galway, by whom he leaves, besides three other sons and two daughters, an eldest surviving son and successor, now Sir Theophilus John St. George, the third Baronet. Sir Richard died on the 29th ultimo, at Sunday's-well, Cork, the residence of the Rev. F. St. George.

PRINCE AMADEUS DE BROGLIE.

PRINCE VICTOR AMADEUS DE BROGLIE, uncle of the present representative of the family, the well-known Duke de Broglie, was born the 23d of October, 1772 He formerly took an active part in political life, and from 1815 to 1830 he was member of the Chamber of Deputies for the department of Eure, in the county of Galway. He was born the 5th of June, 1765, and succeeded his father as second Baronet in 1789. Sir Richard Bligh St. George took rather a prominent part in political life. Mr. Justice Kelly, of Kellyville, in the Queen's County, by whom he had three daughters; he married, secondly, in April, 1807, Bridget, eldest daughter of Theophilus Blakeney, Esq., of Abbert, in the county Galway, by whom he leaves, besides three other sons and two daughters, an eldest surviving son and successor, now Sir Theophilus John St. George, the third Baronet. Sir Richard died on the 29th ultimo, at Sunday's-well, Cork, the residence of the Rev. F. St. George.

GENERAL SIR FREDERICK PHILIPSE ROBINSON, G.C.B.

THIS venerable and very gallant officer, the eldest soldier in the British army, was born in 1764. He was the fourth son of Colonel Beverley Robinson, by his wife, the daughter of Frederick Philipse, Esq., of Philipsborough. He entered the service as an ensign, in February, 1777, and, rising through the various grades, became a General in 1841. The military career of Philipse Robinson was long and glorious, extending over a period of seventy-five years, and presting amidst some of the brightest achievements of his country. For five years he was in the first American war, and was present in the several battles fought during that period, viz., in the year 1794, he went to the West Indies, and shared in the capture of Martinique, St. Lucia, and Guadaloupe. He was also at the storming of Fleur d'Epée and the Heights of Palmiste. In 1812 Philipse Robinson joined the army in the Peninsula. At the battle of Victoria he commanded the brigade which carried the village of Gamarza Mayo, without firing one shot. He also was present at the first and second assaults on San Sebastian, being severely wounded at the second attack. He took part in the passage of the Bidassoa, the grand reconnaissance before Bayonne; the battle of the Nive, being there again severely wounded; in the blockade of Bayonne, and in the repulse of the sortie from that place, when he succeeded to the command on the invasion of the army. In June, 1814, Major-General Robinson went to North America in command of a brigade, and he led the forces intended for the attack of Plattsburg, but received orders to retain the passage of the lake of the Saranac. Soon afterwards he was named Commander-in-Chief and Provisional Governor of the Upper Provinces, which appointment he held until June, 1816. He had received the gold medal with two clasps for Talavera, San Sebastian, and the Nive.

In 1838 Sir Frederick Philipse Robinson was made a G.C.B., and in 1840 he got the colonelcy of the 39th Regiment. Sir Frederick married, first, the daughter of Bowles, Esq., of Kilmington, and, secondly, Miss Fanshaugh. The valiant and able veteran—every inch a soldier of Britain's best mould and mettle—departed this life at Brighton on the 1st instant, full of years and fame, having nearly attained his 88th birthday.

LIEUTENANT-COLONEL FORDYCE.

THE able and gallant officer, who fell in the action at Waterkloof on the 6th of last November, and whose death is so deeply deplored by his regiment, his companions in arms, and his country, was the eldest son of the late Thomas John Fordyce, Esq., of Ayton, N.B., by Anne, daughter of George Buchan, Esq., of Kelloe, N.B., and grandson of the late Right Hon. John Fordyce, of Ayton, for many years Commissioner of his Majesty's Woods and Forests, and member for Parliament for the county of Berwick, by Catherine, daughter of the late Sir William Maxwell, Bart., of Monreith, and sister of the celebrated Sir Robert Gordon.

Lieut.-Colonel Fordyce entered the army in 1828, and served first in Nova Scotia. He rose through the various grades, and became Lieut.-Colonel and commanding officer of the 74th Highlanders in 1847. He was cut off at the early age of forty-two, while leading that regiment into action. He leaves two brothers in the service—Major Fordyce, of the 74th Highlanders, who has just come home from the Cape, and Captain Fordyce, of the 42d Highlanders, who is quartered at Corfu. Of the sisters whom he also leaves, one is married to —Kenyon, Esq., of Shrewsbury.

ROBERT GRAHAME, ESQ.

ROBERT GRAHAME, Esq., of Whitehill, the leading partner in the eminent firm of Grahame and Mitchell, writers, of Glasgow, was well known for his long and consistent advocacy of liberal opinions. He was the first Lord Provost of Glasgow after the passing of the Burgh Reform Bill. Robert Grahame was born more than ninety-two years ago, in Stock well-street, Glasgow; the house of his birth, then looking on orchards and fields, was removed sixty years since. In 1793 Grahame was looked upon as the leading Democrat of the west of Scotland, and from that period forward he was an active, unceasing Reformer. During the course of his busy life, Mr. Grahame had much intercourse with the principal public men of his way of thinking; amongst others he enjoyed the friendship and frequent correspondence of Wilberforce. Mr. Grahame died lately, in his ninety-third year.

WILLIAM BROUGH, C.E.

DIED, on the 29th ult., at Pendlepoir, near Tenby, Pembrokeshire, South Wales, at the advanced age of eighty-six, William Brough, Esq., civil engineer. For upwards of fifty years he practised his profession in South Wales, with great credit to himself, and with satisfaction to his employers; and for many years he was a frequent contributor to the scientific journals of his time, especially on mineralogy.

MRS. HARLOWE.

THIS once celebrated actress died on the last inst., at her lodgings, Gravesend, aged eighty-seven. Her first appearance on the London stage, which was at Covent-garden Theatre, in the play of "The Fugitives," dates as far back as 1790. She retired in 1826. During her long career as a performer she was principally attached to Drury Lane, and was regarded as one of the most sterling comedians of that theatre in its palmiest days. She latterly enjoyed a pension of above £100 a year from the Drury Lane Fund, a provision she in every way truly deserved.

Probate of the will of the late Right Hon. John Holy Hutchinson, Earl of Donoughmore, of Knocklofty, Tipperary, and of Palmerstown House, Dublin, has been granted by the Prerogative Court in Dublin, and subsequently in London, there being £2000 personalty within the province of Canterbury. There are three codicils, all dated in the same year as the will, 1845. The testator's mansion in Dublin is bequeathed to the Earl of Clare, one of his sons and daughters. The acting executors are Thomas Bernard, Esq., and Abraham Brewster, Esq., Q.C. Power reserved to the Countess of Donoughmore, the relict, to prove hereafter.

The late Thomas Dickinson, Esq., of Upper Holloway, has died possessed of £50,000 personalty, and has bequeathed his property in large proportions amongst his family, appointing his daughters, Mrs. Roadnight and Mrs. Willats, the residuary legatees. There are many liberal charitable bequests: viz. £1000 to each of the following institutions—London Hospital, Indigent Blind, Deaf and Dumb, London Orphan Asylum, Infirm, Marine Society, Destitute Sailors' Home, National Benevolent Institution, Gray's-inn-road Free Hospital, Fistula Institution, Charing-cross Hospital, and the Cheesemongers' Benevolent Institution; £500 to the Hotten-garden Infirmary and Dispensary, and to the Labourers' Friend Society; £2000 to the Idiot Asylum at Highgate and Colchester; £1500 to the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, and £1000 to the Governesses' Benevolent Institution. To the last-named institutions there is a contingent reversionary interest of large amount. He has also bequeathed £4000 to the rector of St. Mary's, Whitechapel, the interest to be laid out in bread, coals, &c., for 24 poor persons of that parish, and a legacy of £4000 to St. John's Church, Upper Holloway, for a like purpose.

SEARCH FOR SIR JOHN FRANKLIN.

At Monday's meeting of the Geographical Society Sir R. I. Murchison, in the chair—a letter was read, addressed by Baron Brunnow to the president, confirming the statement in our last Number, as to the objections urged by the Russian Government to Lieut. Pim's proposed search for Sir John Franklin. A copy of the letter of Count Nesselrode to Sir Hamilton Seymour was appended to the Ambassador's communication to the society. The following is the statement of the Imperial Government, which was received with a notice of the lively interest that the Emperor has not ceased to take in the generous efforts made by the British Government to discover traces of the Franklin Expedition, as evinced by the orders issued by his majesty for the same object, having been given to his officers and people on the coasts of Asia and America to assist in every way the British explorers, while instructions have been given to obtain any information of shipwrecks on the northern shores of Siberia. The report then proceeds:

"With similar sentiments of sympathy, the Emperor heard of the expedition proposed by Lieutenant Pim, of the British navy. But, unfortunately, between the conception of such a project and its realisation, physical difficulties and insurmountable obstacles exist, which Mr. Pim, guided by his generous devotion, does not seem to have sufficiently foreseen, and against which it is the duty of the Russian Government to enlighten him. It is easy to trace in the map of the world, across the immense wilderness of Northern Siberia, an itinerary which might lead to the end desired to be reached; but the orders of nature, presenting such a project, it must not be forgotten, that, in addition to the enormous distances to be traversed, vast deserts must also be passed over, which, buried under eternal snows, offer neither means of transport or provisions unexplored regions, in which the tribes of wandering hordes are scattered at wide intervals—people over whom the Russian power exercises only the slightest influence, and whose warlike character, barbarous customs, and hatred of strangers are also well known. Such an arrangement would find it impossible to guarantee the personal security of Lieutenant Pim and his party. To give an idea of the difficulties that such a journey presents, it is well to call to mind the expedition undertaken some years ago by Admiral Wrangel. Prepared during two preceding years by the local authorities, this expedition, though undertaken on a scale of research much less extensive than that now contemplated, had to be discontinued in consequence of a disease among the dogs employed to drag the sledges, and yet fifty sledges and six hundred dogs were required. From this example it is easy to judge of the fate which would attend Mr. Pim and his companions in the endeavour to execute a journey almost treble the extent of that accomplished by Admiral Wrangel, and in which the British officer, having to be accompanied by interpreters, must be provided with more considerable means of transport. The Russian Government, desirous of removing these difficulties, and to establish the basis of an approximate estimate, it is sufficient to remember that, as Admiral Wrangel,was compelled to employ fifty sledges and 600 dogs (each sledge being supplied with from fifty to seventy salt herrings per diem), Lieutenant Pim's expedition would call for from 1200 to 1500 dogs, and provisions in proportion. Now, these animals are only kept in sufficient number for the use of the inhabitants, and it is doubtful if it would be possible to procure, in the Imperial Government does not hesitate to view it as physically impossible."

After some observations upon the improbability of the expedition of Franklin having been abandoned by the ice to the north of Siberia, without some information of the event having been conveyed to the Imperial authorities by the natives, the report concludes by stating that the Imperial Government, having it at heart to neglect nothing which could contribute to the welfare of humanity with the British Government has followed up with so much per everance, the opportunity of proposing to Lieutenant Pim to have further communications with M. Baron Wrangel, in order that every information or measure may be indicated by which tidings may be obtained of the missing expedition

After thanks had been voted to Baron Brunnow, the Chairman stated that Lieutenant Pim, despite of the opposition and many discouragements, was still disposed to persevere; but he had written to the gallant officer not to think of proceeding under such circumstances. He read a letter from Captain Beatson, expressing the writer's belief that Sir John Franklin was to the north of Behring's Straits, and certainly not far to the eastward. He had a schooner of 200 tons ready, which was now fitting out with three separate engines of 8-horse power each, with separate boilers, in order to save coal; he was only in getting this year so far as proposed to take also a steam-launch, with an engine of 6-horse power. His crew was to consist only of 10 men and himself, and his provisions were to be for five years. He would leave, the end of next month, for the Sandwich Islands, and then push on to the straits, so as to enter there by the end of July. His future course would be guided by the condition of the seas. If there was a possibility of getting to the north on or about the meridian of the Straits, he would do so; and certainly not far to the eastward. If he found the north west until he arrived at the open water seen by Wrangel, when perhaps he might be able to get to the north, and then to the east. Should he not succeed covered the plugs were left out! With some waste, Stone and another blocked up the holes. We then prepared to put the boat ready for sea. We lashed the mast to the boat, and threw it overboard, in the expectation it would keep her end on, but, finding the sea breaking over us, we pulled the mast aboard again, and got two sculls out to pull, lashing the other (there being only three on board) at the stern, to steer the boat. We went before the wind, not having sufficient strength to contend with the sea, which was running mountains high. We hoisted a lady's shawl for a sail, and carried on in that way until three in the morning, when it came on to rain heavily. A sea breaking over us carried away our tiller, and I thought then it was all over. By means, however, of a breaker which was left in the boat, and our hats, managed to keep the water out. Towards four in the morning the wind abated. We were then drifting away many miles from the ship, which was one mass of flames, the fire rushing out of every window and porthole, and from the funnels in the height of twenty feet. We lost sight of her about five, but did not see her go down. We continued on our course till about ten o'clock on Sunday, when we thought we saw a sail, but after pulling towards it for one hour we lost all sight. At half-past eleven, or about twelve, a sail hove in sight, and every man piled the oars, and we pulled until half-past six, when we fortunately reached the vessel, a Dutch galliot. As regards the origin of the fire, my firm belief is, that it broke out in the starboard fore store-room, where a large quantity of lamps, oil, and turpentine was kept.

The Quartermaster Dunsford, who is one of those who were landed at Plymouth last week, states that about at quarter to 1 on Sunday morning Mr. Vincent was on the quarter-deck; Mr. Trewicke, the second officer, had had charge of the watch, was on the bridge; and he (Dunsford) was standing directly under him to receive orders. All was still as the grave, save the noise of the engines. He happened to look up to Trewicke about that moment, and saw him leaning listlessly against the railing of the bridge. While looking at him he saw him suddenly start upright at something apparently towards the engine-room. Trewicke had discovered flames rushing up from there. In a moment an alarm was given, and Trewicke ordered Dunsford to cal. the captain. It is customary, when the captain is called in the night, the messengers to make as little noise as possible, in order that the passengers may not be disturbed. Dunsford, however, considered the fire so alarming, that he was, he says, rather boisterous in calling the commander; so much so that he disturbed the passengers, for he knocked at every "fire" called out in several of the cabins. He also heard the passengers bustling about, evidently getting up. Lieutenant Brady's cabin was right opposite the captain's, and Dunsford believes that, from the noise he made, the Admiralty agent must have been disturbed. When Captain Symons opened his cabin door Dunsford said, "There is a fire on board, sir." The captain said, "Whereabouts is it?" "In the engine-room," was the reply The captain immediately ran out of his cabin, and after attempting to put the fire out, and seeing that it was serious, he ran back to his cabin, put on some clothes, and immediately returned. Dunsford said, that it was some time before any one thought that the fire could be conquered. When they had done their utmost, and the flames had thought broke on them that they could not save their ship, Dunsford and a few of the crew, during an awful pause, were standing near Mr. Roberts, the chief officer. They immediately surrounded him, and asked what they were then orders. They said, "We are all willing to obey you, sir, whatever commands you may give us. Tell us what we shall do." He looked at them for a moment calmly, though suffering great mental anguish, and said, "Men, I am grateful for having a word he went below. Dunsford believes that Roberts knew not for the moment what orders to give, that he went below to see what was best to be done, and that then he knew what to do.

The directors of the Royal West India Mail Company have generously granted a donation of one month's pay to the survivors of the crew of the ill-fated steamship Amazon, besides an allowance to each party of £5 10s. as compensation for the loss of his kit. The subscription started in the City on behalf of the widows and children of the unfortunate sufferers progresses with much spirit, and already amounts to nearly £2000.

Not less than twenty widows and forty fatherless children, in Southampton alone, have been left to deplore the premature loss of their natural protectors by this dreadful calamity.

OFFICIAL INVESTIGATION.

On Thursday an investigation into the circumstances attending the loss of the Amazon took place at the company's offices, Moorgate-street; Mr. Shepherd in the chair.

A paper having been read, which was issued by the company, prohibiting the shipment of any of an unsuitable or combustible nature, unless the proper measures were examined, but nothing of a definite character tending to throw light on the origin of the fire was elicited.

Mr. Nelson, one of the passengers in the ill-fated ship, gave the following piece of testimony as to the probable cause of the disaster:

"On the Saturday I was below, conversing with Allen, the engineer, and then found that the partition of the grease-room was on fire, and that the iron wood near the steam-chest was also hot. About a quarter-past twelve on Saturday night I perceived that if a fire should take place it would come out very rapidly. Where the smoke-stack was the heat was very excessive also. I struck me that from the heat in the smoke-stack it would be sufficient to ignite it, and to ignite and produce a small flame. My own impression is, that a combination of circumstances produced the fire. At the first bell I went below and communicated my suspicions to the engineer, and another man with him. The fire-buckets were ranged above their heads. I then went to bed, and in three minutes afterwards I heard a slight shrilling of 'Fire!' I went on deck, and saw a bright spirted flame coming up from the engine-room, between the two paddle-shaft. It struck me at once that the cause was confined in a short space. I went down and pressed. A lady came in and I recommended her to make for the boats. I saw that the fire was increasing, and that the shrilling all they could to extinguish the flames, but not then directing their attention to the boats. * * * * * *

I have been frequently on steam-boats, but never crossed the Atlantic before. My own impression was that the flues of the boilers were too short, and that the heat was coming up the chimney very strongly. I have paid great attention to machinery, and was going to the West Indies to see after some for myself. I knew after starting I got in conversation with Mr. Allen. The engineers are, I think, entirely free from blame, and I never saw men more attentive to their duties than Mr. Allen and Mr. Allen. Mr. Allen was always down at the engines, I observed to him, "You may depend upon it there is an uneven bearing, or you would not have that screaming in the machinery," and I added, that when they had got a voyage or two they would have more ease. I am quite convinced that the engines had nothing to do with the fire. I have seen Fawcett's, and Forester's, and other engines, and I never saw a better pair of engines in my life; and, but for the heating of the bearings, they were capable of doing their work in first-rate style. I think the cause of the conflagration was the dropping of the tar on the cinders. There was a quantity of coal on the floor of the stoke-hole, which was in heated state, and if tar had fallen on that coal it must have ignited very rapidly. I entertained apprehensions about the ship and crew, and I spoke to the captain, who said that he was delighted with the ship, but with one or two exceptions he hadn't as own men, as they had no time to make a boat's crew. I went on the spar-deck with a hot air to induce me to put my hand on the beam of the main-deck. The funnel was at a sufficient distance from the beam to prevent fire. When I heard the cry of "Fire!" and came on deck, I saw the flames and sparks of fire coming up the main engine hatchway. I saw coals lying at the bottom of the store_room, which was covered with iron plates My own impression was that the fire was purely accidental, and, but for an ungent, the fire would not have taken place. I think too life-boats were not properly arranged, and could not have been used under night or terms."

Captain Mangles said a committee was about to be appointed to arrange the evidence, and every suggestion which was made by Mr. Nelson and others would be attended to.

Mr. Nelson: The life-boats were good boats, but when one of them tumbled over she was a great weight to lift up again. After we left the ship, and had been pulling for some time, we had a prospect of five or six days' pulling before us without food or water I think, if a gutta percha fitting were put to the bottom of the boats, provisions might be stowed away for five or six weeks, and the weight would not exceed 15 cwt.

Captain Mangles remarked that he should put his suggestions in the form of a letter, and they would receive every attention.

Mr. Nelson: I will do so.

There was no other evidence of any value adduced.

Captain Beachey was present to watch the proceedings on the part of the Board of Trade

There was no one in attendance on the part of the Admiralty, but the following letter to the secretary of the company was received:—

"Admiralty, 14th January, 1852 With reference to your letter of the 12th inst., respecting the investigation which is taking place regarding the loss of the Amazon, steam-packet, I am commanded by my Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty to acquaint you that my Lords will be very much obliged to you for the copy of the evidence when printed; but that in the present state of the proceedings their Lordships do not think it necessary to interfere. I am, Gentlemen, Your very obedient humble servant, W. A. B. HAMILTON."

EXPULSION OF AN ENGLISH MISSIONARY.—"The English missionary," writes the Vienna correspondent of the Morning Chronicle on the 9th inst., "whose expulsion from Lemberg I mentioned in a recent letter, has arrived in Vienna. His motives for coming into Austria, it is needless to say, were purely of a religious nature; and, although his was not his first mission to convert the Jews in Galicia and Hungary, it is the first time he was ever molested by the police. He is now trying what can be done in high quarters to obtain a revocation of his sentence; and, as a last resource, has appealed to the British Ambassador with what success remains to be seen. It is most likely that, instead of gaining any redress, his brethren, who are preaching in Hungary and other parts of the empire, will likewise receive orders to leave. This is but a natural consequence of the present state of things."

THE GROSS OUTRAGE ON MR. MATHER AT FLORENCE.—The cowardly assault of the Austrian officers on Mr. Mather, an account of which appeared in last week's ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, has been officially represented to the Foreign Minister, Lord Granville, as well as to the Chargé d'Affaires at Florence. Mr. Mather at the latest accounts was recovering from his wounds. His brother, in a letter of the 3d, refers to the kindness of Mr. Charles Lever, the author, whose attentions had been unremitting. Mr. Mather had then been six days in the City Hospital, in what is called "the noble-room," set apart for the higher classes. All the English in Florence had called, but Mr. Mather was kept strictly quiet; the medical officers of the hospital had behaved with the utmost humanity.

SUBSCRIPTION IN AID OF THE SURVIVORS OF THE AMAZON AND THEIR FAMILIES.—On Monday a crowded meeting was held in the Guildhall, Southampton, the Mayor presiding, to organise a committee and take other measures for the promotion of the subscription on behalf of the surviving sufferers of the late fire on board the Amazon. The meeting was convened by her Majesty the Queen to make inquiries with respect to any assistance that it was proposed to extend to the unfortunate widows and orphans of the sufferers in the late great calamity, and to report the result of the inquiry to her Majesty, in order to submit your letter to the Queen and the Prince, and I have received the commands of her Majesty and his Royal Highness to acquaint you that, in the event of a public subscription being opened for the relief of the families reduced to distress by this fearful calamity, you are authorised to announce a subscription of £100 upon the part of her Majesty and his Royal Highness. Any information that you can give me as to the position in life of particular circumstances of any of those who have unfortunately perished I shall be obliged to you if you will communicate. Can you tell me anything of Mr. Vincent, whose conduct has been so highly spoken of—Believe me, dear sir, yours truly, C. B. PHIPPS. To Alexander Duncan, Esq." The reading of this kind letter elicited hearty applause, as did many of those which followed. Upwards of fifty letters in all were read, each enclosing a contribution, and the amount announced as having been received made up a total of £1000 before the proceedings closed. During the proceedings, Mr. W. Vincent—the young midshipman who behaved with so much courageous gallantry in the fire-boat, during the most perilous moments of the conflagration on board the Amazon—entered the hall, and was welcomed with several rounds of enthusiastic cheering. A similar expression of sympathy was also manifested towards Mr. Williamson, the chief engineer, and one of the surviving firemen, both of whom were in the hall. Amongst the resolutions adopted was one expressing the approbation of the meeting at the conduct of the surviving members of the crew, and especially that of Mr. Vincent, the resolution being moved in two animations, and three hearty rounds of cheering were given for Mr. Vincent, and three for Mr. Williamson, and the other survivors. Mr. Vincent said he deeply felt the compliments they were pleased to bestow upon him, but he could not say he might have been providentially enabled to render for the saving of his own and his fellow-creatures' lives. The memory of that awful night would never be effaced from his mind, and whatever abilities he might hereafter be placed he hoped he should alway remember, and be able to act upon, the words of the immortal Nelson, "England expects that every man this day will do his duty!" (Great cheering.) Several gentlemen having addressed the meeting, a vote of thanks to the Mayor closed the proceedings. It was announced in the Audit-house every day to receive subscriptions, and on other business connected with their important and interesting duties.

The increase in the number of accounts opened by the Manchester and Salford Savings Bank during 1851 was 2436; and the increase in the amount deposited is no less than £61,136 8s. 9d. During the year, in the annual depositors 32 accounts were closed, and £6,695 received for the purpose money; and some idea may be formed of the extent of this branch of the business, from the fact that the half-yearly dividends now paid to annuitants amount to nearly £5000 a year.

The formal opening last week of the Exchange at Wolverhampton (the metropolis of the iron districts) constitutes a characteristic of the present period. Wolverhampton is the principal resort on matters of business for the ironmasters of South Staffordshire; and the erection of so splendid and convenient a structure as that now occupied by the merchants and manufacturers of the neighbourhood is highly creditable, as we hope it will be equally profitable, to the enterprising inhabitants of that town.

SHOREBLACK BRIGADE IN LIVERPOOL.—On Monday a number of boys from the Ragged Schools commenced operations as shoe-polishers. The lads comprising the brigade were attired in a suit of blue frock, with white badges, and oilskin caps; each had suspended over his breast a box, locked, in which was dropped the pence of the customers. The brigade was stationed along the docks and the most populous thoroughfares of the town. On return to school, in the evening the boxes are delivered up, and they are paid a certain sum per day as wages.

EXPLOSION OF FIREDAMP AT WIGAN.—An explosion of firedamp took place at an early hour on Friday, the 9th instant, at Mr. Ainsworth's collieries, Kit-green, near Norbury Hall, Pemberton, about two miles from Wigan. Sixteen persons were burned, but none of them were killed.

Salmon fishing in the river Severn has opened this week, and hitherto the take has been very good, especially in the upper portions of the river—the Worcestershire district —where the fishing is most valuable early in the season, when they have the advantage of the fish which have passed up in the fence time.

The firm of FOX, Henderson, and Co. have entered into a contract with the directors of the Midland Great Western Railway Company (Ireland) to lay down the telegraph between Dublin and Galway. The same firm are in negotiation with the Great Southern and Western Railway Company to lay down the telegraph between Dublin and Cork.

The Assistant Barrister for the county of Limerick has decided that all religious houses and charitable institutions are exempt from liability to assessment.

MIDLAND COUNTIES OBSERVATORY.—At a meeting held on Tuesday in the Exchange Hall, Nottingham—the Duke of Newcastle in the chair it was resolved: "That Mr. Lassell's munificent gift of his magnificent and valuable collection of astronomical instruments, and the gift of 1000 guineas towards its establishment, presents a suitable occasion for making an effort req laves to the securing of an Observatory in this district." The collection of philosophical society would be a great advantage to this district, and recommends the early formation of one." A committee was appointed to carry the project into execution.

MONTGOMERYSHIRE POSTAL ARRANGEMENTS.—An important arrangement has just been made by the Postmaster-General for a regular post between Llanidloes and Llangerrig, in Montgomeryshire, to meet the Gloucester and Aberystwith mail. The eastern portion of the county of Montgomery by this means will be much benefited in its postal communications, inasmuch as nearly two days will be saved in the receipt of letters from Bristol, the southern shores of Wales, Gloucester, and the midland districts, and the west of England generally. It is understood that this advantage has been gained through the exertions of Mr David Pugh, M.P. for the Montgomeryshire boroughs, and it is a boon that will be fully appreciated by the peasants

GREAT YARMOUTH.—On the morning of the 11th inst., at about four o'clock, the Humbity, of Selby, John Shipstone master, from London, bound to Selby, with a general cargo, during a very heavy gale drove on to the beach at Hopton. The sea was running over her, the cargo washing on, and to destruction of the crew, who were seen clinging to the rigging, appeared inevitable, when Mr. Brighton Sivers, an active life-surveyor of the port, arrived in charge of the company's apparatus, with the assistance of which he brought the crew safely on shore.

A new Belgian loan is proposed for 26 millions of francs. It is to be raised as a l ... per Cent. Stock.

I ... ayment of Spanish Active Bonds sent in for conversion at present is about £ 600,000

It is with pleasure we hear that the firm of Messrs. Seaward and Capel, whose failures was announced last week, will be enabled to pay 20s. in the pound.

Notw.thstanding the abundance of money, and the never-exceeded amount of gold in the Bank of England, with the strong probability of a further increase, there are many causes to justify private individuals hesitating before making any permanent investment, either immediately or for some months to come. The difficulties that every month must increase around the ruler of the French nation, arising not only from his financial position, but still more from the constant demands of the army, may render a war necessary in his own safety; with the means sufficiently brought under operation, and the whole crew were speedily rescued from a most perilous position, thus making, in all, 91 lives Mr. Silvers has had the good fortune to save by the use of this valuable invention

ARMS FOUND!

Arma virumque cano——

My name is Blogg——Blogg, of —— but, no, those days are over! I now mean to exhibit myself as a frightful example. I am a goose, displayed, pierced by my own stupidity. I am a victim of a heraldic weakness, which has been my curse. Listen to my tale.

I was brought up—(be a man, Blogg, and out with it!)—a tailor. I came into a good round sum with my father's business; I married; had a family; and was a prosperous man. In an evil hour I fell in with "Huggins's Heraldic Hints." There was an alliteration in the title which fascinated me. The fascination extended to the subject. Having plenty of leisure (for my foreman managed the business for me—a trustworthy dog—though of obscure origine), I spent hours in my Highgate villa, in the study. I rode on the wings of griffins, and flew through the skies on dragons; I had lions couchant at my feet. Never were such visions. I was perpetually building castles in the air, and every castle had an escutcheon neatly carved on the front. I blush when I think of my extravagances in those days. Had you mentioned to me Mr. Millais' picture of the "Return of the Dove to the Ark," the title would have suggested nothing to my imagination but the blazon of a dove, argent, volant, beaked, azure, legged, gules!

Of course my thoughts soon turned to my own pretensions in the way of antiquity. The first friend to whom I hinted the idea, remarked that, as a tailor, I could not be in want of a coat. Of course, he thought this a joke. I dropped his acquaintance. A low, vulgar pleasantry of that character was not to be endured. I comforted myself with reflecting that the old families of England used to have a jester, whom they called a Fool, in attendance on them. The office is abolished, people being their own fools now-a-days, as I once heard a low scribbler assert—but I nicknamed Jenkins "my fool;" and many a good thing I said about him, afterwards, to our acquaintances, though I would never make it up.

Well, one day I saw an advertisement in the papers, headed "Arms Found." The advertiser professed to supply arms to everybody. I went down to the place, and found a little fellow of pale and studious aspect sitting in a shop, surrounded by warriors of plaster of Paris, bearing blazoned shields. I was awed by the appearances around me—though how people can ever care for such barbarous painted pigmies, meaningless re—— but I am anticipating. I muttered something about arms, timidly; I expected to be asked for my pedigree. No such thing. A more lively, deferential little fellow I never saw. "Name and county, sir?" he said, with his sweetest smile. "Blogg," I said slowly, and blushing a little, and "Warwickshire"—for I remembered that my father used to say that his father kept a—lived, in fact, in a village on the borders there. (Blogg, be firm!)

"Blogg?" said the little man, sweetly. There was an artfulness about that glib little wretch which I remember with disgust to this hour. He uttered the rudest names with a sweetness that made them sound quite Norman. He lingered mellifluously over syllables in a manner perfectly honeying.

He took down a large tome—the margins all covered with MS. notes—while I stood by, gazing reverently on, like a man watching a magician about to conjure up for him some figure of the past. He paused, mused, and looked up.

Never shall I forget my emotions when he said, "Blogg, the same name as Blogue, sir, only spelt differently (spelling, till lately, quite arbitrary in our good families, sir)—Blogue or De Blogue, for there is a Castle Blogue in Normandy, from which the family took their name. Founder, a Norman knight, got the lands from William Rufus. Married with the Courtenays during the Wars of the Roses. Sheriffs repeatedly. Bear a leopard in pale, holding a cross in its dexter paw, all within a tressure fleury!"

I gasped for breath. I had been soused into a sea of aristocracy by the villain, and I came up half drowned. I had some further conversation. These Blogues had lands, it seemed, in Warwickshire. There was even a barony in abeyance, Mr. Peller (the Arms-finder) said. I am afraid he pumped me, for I remember talking of my fortune. And when I left, it was after ordering a seal, a book plate, three knights with the arms emblazoned, and a porcelain pipe-bowl with ditto burnt in!

"Come to my arms!" I shouted to Mrs. B., unconsciously making a wretched pun, when I got home. "I am Norman, and I am happy!"

"You are English, and you are drunk, B.," said that strong-minded woman. I began to hate her. I felt that I had polluted the pur sang (you see I had got hold of all the slang) of De Blogue by the alliance. I got to such a pitch that I wished she was dead and what a magnificent hatchment I resolved to put up afterwards!

Well, nothing would satisfy me but to have the leopard carved on the front of our gate leading to the villa, now named Blogue-ville. It was done. And if we wanted proof of the debased nature of our populace, it would be found in the fact, that morning after morning there was a pipe in that leopard's mouth.

The reader will perceive what my next move was, from a simple anecdote.

"Why, Jacky," said my friend Snigsby, rushing into my room, in his coarse manner, one morning, "I didn't know you had a second name."

"A second name!" I inquired in my easy, aristocratic way.

"Why, the flunkey in that queer coat said, Mr. D. Blogg. Your name's Jack Blogg, ain't it?"

"My livery servant said De Blogue, Snigsby, and it is my family name," I replied, in a marked manner.

It was not many weeks afterwards that I was strolling down from my house when I paused to look in at a window. I had noticed that a couple of plebeians were eyeing me rather closely. Presently, they strolled behind me. I heard them whispering earnestly.

"That 's him," said one. I felt my pride tickled.

"Nonsense. He 's" here his voice fell "he 's a swell, I tell you. This is"—and here his voice fell again.

"Mr. De Blogue?" said the first speaker, coming up with his companion. "Yes," I said, "that 's my name."

"Suit of Levy, 1300*l.*," said the man. I partially recovered my senses in the cab which bore me to the sponging-house.

* * * * * *

I was in for the debt of a rel —no, a namesake—I am above these weaknesses now!—a young De Blogue in the Heavy Baboon Regiment, of whose existence I had never heard. The lawyer who issued the writ found out his mistake. He came hurrying down to the sponging house and got me out.

"Why, what De Blogue are you, sir? It's very awkward. Why, execution has issued." I turned deadly pale. "You'll get the things again, but ——"

I remembered my ancestor (!) at Acre, and bore up against the misfortune.

"I 'm a Warwickshire De Blogue," I began.

"Why, they 're all Warwickshire, of course," the lawyer said.

"I thought the direct line ended in a female ——"

The lawyer looked at me with an altogether changed expression, and shook his head. "Come along, sir," he said in a coaxing way. I supposed he was pitying my troubles.

As I got into a cab, I heard him saying to the sheriff's officer—"Ended in a female. I 'm much mistaken if he won't end in a lunatic asylum!"

I returned to my "deserted halls," as I might now with perfect truth, as well as picturesqueness, call my establishment at Highgate. Execution had issued. Nothing was left in the house but a few brass carpeting rods in a corner. The bailiffs had seized my Penates. My Lar was gone to the brokers. Mrs. B. was off to her father's in the country. I invoked the shades of my ancestors, in my infatuated way. Of course they did not come. The shades of nobody's ancestors ever do come, any more than the police, when called. I stood on my lonely hearth solitary among the bluebottles.

* * * * * *

I now approach the "closing scene" of my troubles. I tremble as I think of what followed. "Rap, rap," came to the gate.

"Here, Jack—that 's him!" I was in the hands of the Police. The reader will scarcely believe the remainder of my narrative. Read, just, the following newspaper paragraph:—

"EXTRAORDINARY SWINDLING. The noble family of De B—— has been suffering from the tricks of one of the most audacious swindlers of our time. It seems that the fellow assumed their name, and obtained goods in it, at the village of ——, near London. A young and gallant officer of the family, as far as we can understand, was the particular individual he passed for. Our police reports will, doubtless, soon contain further particulars."

I was brought before a magistrate next morning

"What else did he pass for besides De Blogue; any other aliases?" said the magistrate.

I heard a snuffling noise. I saw my wife mount the witness-box. I heard the voluble tongue of the woman ringing away before the court, as undauntedly as a muffin-bell.

"It 's all a mistake, your worship. He 's a respectable tailor, and his name is John Blogg. Here are a dozen people to prove it."

And sure enough there were. All our old family friends were there. I was safe; but what ignominious safety!

I saw another face which I knew very well. He was a glib little radical lawyer, a friend of my wife's family. He did clear up my case—but I felt very like a blackamoor being scrubbed white with birch brooms.

"The fact is, your worship, his name is Blogg; his father was a tailor, and the son of a Peter Blogg who came to Pleb-Biddlecomb, in Warwickshire, as a travelling hawker, about 1779. No Bloggs appear in the parish register of the village earlier than that——"

* This reflection will be found inconsistent with Mr. Blogg's subsequently stated principles; but the paper was written under great mental affliction.—ED.

I felt the Norman blood oozing away—like a stream of beer when you withdraw the spigot. I felt bled into a syncope of plebeianism!

"Earlier than 1779," resumed the lawyer, emphatically. "But when the effects of Peter Blogg were examined by the parochial authorities of the union, his 'mark' was found appended on some old paper to the name of Blogginton—that of a Saxon hamlet in Staffordshire, from which many of the pensantry derived their surnames, when surnames began to be used—and "

The magistrate cut short this awful harangue. I left the court—without a stain on my escutcheon, or rather without any escutcheon to stain. I cursed the old Dowager De Blogue, whose stupidity and malignity combined to get me into this scrape. Confound her pride! she thinks her young De B. a model son, though he's always in debt. I, plain John Blogg, have thrown overboard leopard, treasure, and all. I could buy them all up. I'm told they're as poor as rats.

And, after all, what is all that kind of thing but a barbarous relic of feudalism? it's only an accident. It has no foundation in

A QUEER BEDFELLOW FOR A CHRISTMAS-EVE.

CHRISTMAS was come, and Washingley Hall was filled with guests. I know no country house in which I would sooner have passed that cheerful season. Sir George was hospitality itself; and as for Lady Stanley, her frank manners and natural amiability of disposition completely won the hearts of all her visitors; while their family of happy children, from blooming, blushing, Fanny of sweet seventeen, and Master Harry, who was just beginning to think about shaving, down to little blue-eyed Trotty, who was the pet of everyone and the privileged romp of the family,—all reflected their parents' goodness, and made that merry mansion in a house without which Christmas would not be complete. We were a large party as the hall, and had tested its ample accommodation to the uttermost. All the dressing-rooms were pressed into use for us bachelors, and even the sacredness of the housekeeper's still room was desecrated and converted into a species of barracks for "the young gentlemen." The ladies, it was rumoured, had made compacts of partnership, and thus it was, as we afterwards learned, that Fanny Stanley shared Helen Warrington's bed. The greater part of the guests, Helen and her brother among the rest, did not arrive until Christmas-eve, so that our dinner on that night was our first general meeting, and passed off right merrily.

When the Christmas romps with the children were over, and the mistletoe had been put up, and "the girls all kissed" (as Tennyson observes with such collective unction), and when the juveniles had been posted off to their night-barracks, we all drew around the spacious fire-place, and, while the yule-log blazed bright and cheerily, told Christmas stories, in which ghosts were as plentiful as blackberries. In one tale that was then told, the hero belonged to a family in which insanity was hereditary, and (as is commonly the case in such circumstances) appeared only in alternate generations; and thus, in the family mentioned, the sane son of a madman invariably became, in his turn, the father of a madman. I forget now who related the story of which this was the theme, but I remember it was some one who had not met the Warringtons before, and was ignorant of the fact that Helen's grandfather had died in an Asylum, and that she herself had, some years previously, when at school, been "in a low way," sufficient to cause, at that time, considerable anxiety to her mother. This, however, was not known to the narrator of the story, and, indeed, was not remembered by those present, until after events recalled it to their memory; and Helen Warrington, too, was, at that time, a fine, handsome, merry-hearted girl, and one of the acknowledged belles of the county. What effect the tale may have had upon her, no one could then tell, as she sat back in the shade of the room, which was only lighted by the blazing fire.

That was the last tale told, and a light supper (for, on the children's account, we had dined rather early,) that was discussed amid lively jokes and merriment, soon dissipated all the little lady-like fears the ghost-stories of the night had given rise to, and the waits, and the village band soon after coming, with their Christmas-carol serenade, we sat for some time longer round the fire, until midnight, and the earliest dawn of the Christmas morning had come, and then, wishing each other "a merry Christmas," we all said good-night.

I have said that Fanny Stanley and Helen Warrington shared the same bed, and when, an hour after this, their maid had left their room, two of the loveliest faces of all the lovely ones that, on that night were assembled beneath the roof of Washingley, pressed the laced-pillows of the downy bed. It was not till the morrow that the maid called to mind the flushed cheeks and wild brilliancy of Helen Warrington's dark eyes, as she laughingly bade her take a kiss of her young mistress, and wish her a merry Christmas, lest she should not have the chance next year. What followed from that time I shall describe as it was afterwards told to me.

After a little chat with Helen, Fanny had sunk into a slumber. How long she slept she knew not, but, on awakening, she missed her companion from her side, and on sitting up in bed, and looking around her, she saw Helen Warrington pacing along the other side of the old-fashioned bed-room. It was a beautifully bright night, and the light of the moonbeams shone full upon the two windows of the room, and upon Helen walking there in her night-dress, her cap off, and her long black hair streaming over her shoulders.

"Helen, dear! Come to bed! You will catch cold: are you ill?"

The white-robed figure stopped in its pacings to and fro, and came up to the bed-side.

"Helen, what's the matter? How strange you look! You must be ill?" For Helen stood there without speaking, but looking fixedly at Fanny, with a strange wildness of expression. Fanny began to throw off the clothes to rise from the bed to assist her friend, believing her to be ill. Then Helen spoke.

"Lie still, Fanny! I am not ill, but I have come to put an end to your life. I must kill you!" And her words came in a low but distinct whisper, strangely at variance with her usual quick manner of speaking.

Fanny trembled in spite of herself, and she said, with half fear in her tone, "Come Helen, what nonsense! Come to bed. We will act charades to-morrow night." Still the white-robed figure stood there, at the foot of the bed, glaring with its eyes. "I tell you, girl," it said, "you have but a few minutes to live! Say your prayers, and make your peace with God. His has sent me to destroy you!" In an instant, a crowd of thoughts rushed tumultuously through Fanny's brain; the conversation round the fire—the tale of the madman—the insanity of Helen's grandfather—and a hundred other things, all with lightning speed, linked themselves together in her mind, and she felt that Helen's long-concealed hereditary malady had burst forth, and that she was mad!

Even then she did not lose her presence of mind; and, with a forced laugh, she said, "Come Helen, dear—come back to bed you know you cannot do what you are jesting about."

"Not kill you! Think you so? You are deceived, girl," said the white-robed figure. "I provided for all that, hours ago. Look here!" and raising her arm high in the air, the moonlight flashed on the shining blade of a large knife. With the cunning of insanity she had contrived, unseen, to take it from the supper-table, and conceal it within the folds of her dress.

When the poor girl saw the knife, she sprang from the bed, and, with a loud scream, reached the door, and endeavoured to open it. It was locked, and the key removed. She then, in a delirium of agony, turned and fled to the fire place, to seize the bell-rope and alarm the house, but only to find the rope severed and useless. During this brief space the white robed figure stood and watched her actions—apparently enjoying her despairing disappointment with a wild satisfaction. "Now, girl," it said, "you see all escape is hopeless: so you have now nothing to do but to die!" And she advanced with her uplifted knife, and gleaming eyes

"O Helen! Helen! spare my life! Help!—Help!" and Fanny shrieked in agony. As she turned, half paralysed with fear, to fly wildly about the room, she espied a closet, the door of which stood ajar, and into this she sprang, and, with the rapidity of a sudden thought, drew to the door, shrieking loudly for help. There was but little hope left for the poor girl, for the inside of the door was not furnished with a handle, and her only chance of keeping it closed was by fixing her fingers tightly round the lock, and so pulling it towards her. This she did with all the energy of desperation. But, at the best of times, this would have been a difficult thing to do; and now that she had to contend with the unnatural strength of a maniac, her chance of safety was poor indeed. Fear, however, and the love of life gave a new vigour to her frame, and sustained her in those terrible moments. Helen had got the handle of the door on the outside, and was trying to force her way in, while Fanny clung the more tightly and despairingly to the lock, well knowing that upon this depended her safety. But, in a few seconds, the severity of the exertion had bathed her hands in a clammy perspiration, and, with a horror scarcely to be described, she felt that the security of her hold was relaxing. The door opened slowly, but surely, and swung backwards and forwards with her attempts to counteract the force the maniac was applying to it. As the figure of Helen was thus revealed to her, her dark hair tossing wildly over her night-dress, and her arm making the air with the same blade through the partially opened door, the courage which had hitherto sustained her now gave way, her weak hands relaxed from their hold, and, uttering but one more piercing shriek, she fell back senseless on the closet floor.

It so happened that the dressing-room in which, for that night, I had been put to sleep, joined the bed-room in which these scenes took place. One of Fanny's piercing shrieks had aroused me, and I had started from my bed in terror, impressed with the idea that the house was on fire, though not knowing from which direction the alarm had proceeded. In a moment I had partially dressed myself, when another and another shriek told me too plainly from what quarter they came.

The second door of the dressing-room which opened into the bed-room would, of course, be locked. Without losing time by trying this, I picked up a heavy portmanteau, which had, fortunately, not been unpacked, and swinging it round me at the lock of the door, with one heavy, crushing blow that burst open the door, and threw down a dressing-table placed against it on the other side, I sprang into the room.

I shall never forget the scene. At the closet-door was Helen Warrington, with madness stamped in every look and action, her night-dress in confusion, and her dishevelled hair falling down over her shoulders. Her left arm supported the passive form of Fanny Stanley, who lay senseless and motionless in her grasp, while her right wielded the knife, which she appeared about to plunge in the white bosom on which the moonlight shone so purely. To note all this was but the work of an instant; in another instant I was at her side.

She had risen to receive me as I came up, and with a sort of saddened, reproachful look in her wild dark eyes, said, "Would you stand between me and God?" Before she could use the knife on Fanny's form, or anticipate what I was about to do, I whirled the knife out of her hand. At once she threw Fanny from her, and rushed to the bedside to re-possess herself of her weapon, but I threw myself upon her and held her firmly to the ground. Others had come to the door, and were trying, ineffectually, to obtain admittance. Amongst them, I heard Sir George's voice, calling in despair on his daughter's name, for he had recognised her alarming cries, and had fled along the corridor in an agony of terror. I called loudly to him to go round by my room, which, it seemed, in the hurried excitement of the moment, no one remembered as communicating with the bed-room. Directly afterwards they joined me. It wanted no words to explain the sad tale, and poor Warrington, who was one of those who had rushed in, was the first to assist me in securing his sister. Others assisted Fanny, who was still in a swooning state, into her room.

I need not pursue these distressing details further. The physicians who were called in, did all they could; but human skill was ineffectual for one who was now a confirmed maniac.

* * * * * * *

Poor Helen Warrington still lives in the Asylum in which she was placed from the first. Fanny and I go to see her at intervals, but at no time has she recognised us. Under the kind discipline, and humane treatment of Dr. ——, she appears to pass her days happily. And, may we not hope that those whom God has thus been pleased to afflict, have an inner light of happiness, which shines the more brightly, because it shines only for them?

As for Fanny, she has changed her name. Her deliverer on that terrible Christmas-eve is now her husband.

C. B.

STREET DOGS.

IT is often my lot to come home late at night, or rather early in the morning. What some do for pleasure I am forced, without any pleasure at all, to do by the stern necessities of life. There is one advantage, perhaps, and only one, to be gained by these nocturnal or matutinal perambulations. You see strange glimpses of a world which night hides from men who go to bed at decent hours. I do not intend to speak of these now. Though only a poor simple devil with one stick, trudging home through mud and rain, or haply staring up a smug, perky looking street, shining fresh and clean in the morning sun, and wondering if it can be the same file of houses which looks so dingy and seedy at noon, I have seen some wonderful things, too—queer bits of life—mysteries—whole rows of pegs to hang webs of fancy on. I discovered that London has its parishes as well as Hindoostan—poor dumb, feline, canine ne'er-do-wells, houseless, preying on fortune in the kennels and gutters, hovering on the outskirts of the markets, and carrying on a guerilla warfare against the rats, or disputing with felines the possession of promiscuous fish-bones. Poor fellows, I pity them—they are separated from man—degradation is stamped on them from the tip of the nose to the last joint of the tail, and they slink through the street like thieves, having above all things a dread of the police, when they dodge with preternatural sagacity. And yet they would fain be friends with man once more. Watch how that ragged but terrier will eye you from his sole remaining optic, as he stands in the middle of the street revolving in his mind whether it would be safe to place himself within reach of your stick. A whistle, a chirrup, a snap of the fingers—his miserable heart is like to break for joy—he flies up on you in frantic delight, oscillates his stumpy tail till it is like to snap short off, and will follow you to the death. It seldom happens that he is worth having. He is not fit even for sausage-meat—the dog stealers won't have him—the fiercest little boys are touched with compassion if they come on him in his lair at day-time, and pass him by without the compliment of persecution. Then, as you get near home, you feel he is a bore—that you never could lift up your eyes before the servant maid in the morning if such a mongrel was let inside your threshold; and so, as you begin to feel for your latch-key, the cane is uplifted against him, and in an instant, with a shriek cry of agony, the outcast vanishes in the darkness. Alas! how many pangs have I caused in this way—how many brief friendships have I broken, as though they had been with my fellow-creatures.

By necessity I have become apparently callous, hard hearted, and now, the minute I see a pariah, I hoot him off, lest I should cause him the bitter sorrow of disappointed hopes. But what becomes of the street dogs? Do they commit suicide? Do those pulpy masses that are seen wabbling about in the dirty Thames at every tide speak of man's cruelty, or canine despair? Perhaps "the Bridge of Sighs" is to some of the parias a refuge from utter wretchedness and starvation. They can get on it without paying toll. (By the by, what a terrible halfpenny that is which is laid down before the unsuspecting toll-taker, ere the fatal jump can be taken into that turbid Lethe!) If they do not go off this way, what becomes of them? There are hundreds, thousands in London. Most of them seem almost in extremis, and yet the most experienced chiffonier, or street sweeper, cannot depose ever having come across the dead body of one. I speak with authority on this point. My conclusion is, that some reform, get into respectable society, and die in their beds, and that others die by the town's end. Some of these individuals are very extraordinary characters—oddities, in fact, which may account for their not getting on well in the world. Once on a time I met an old pointer, about half past two o'clock a.m., on Westminster bridge. I entered into conversation with him, through the medium of a bit of biscuit. He had the usual allowance of one eye, his clothes were much damaged by mange, and rents probably made by pitchforks, but still, on the whole, he had a mark of high breeding and good blood about him, and when he had resolved on entering my service, he gave me an idea that he was a fellow of quality by the indignant way in which he received the advances of a little mongrel, not unlike a fancy rabbit, who rushed out from the cab stand in Palace yard to greet him. He beat the streets with great steadiness, seemed to intimate the probability of there being partridge in St. James's, and came to the wind in a very practical and knowing way at Trafalgar-square. Indeed his general demeanour was so exemplary that I had visions of sporting over him in the autumn, and had already devised a neat fib to tell my wife as to Jones having sent me a splendid dog (warranted not to bite children on any provocation whatever) when he came to a dead point. The fact was rather remarkable, inasmuch as the chances were greatly against either grouse or hare being at that time in St. Martin's-lane: but still the fact was notorious. There he stood in the most earnest dog attitude his nose nicely attuned to the position of his shoulder—the dexter leg gently raised and bent under the forehand, the other planted firmly in advance, and the tail forming a right line with the dorsal vertebræ. The heart of Peter Hawker would have beat with joy within his venerable ribs, had he seen it. I admit I thought of many things—a tame grouse from Hungerford market, a horse-cloth from its open carriage, dropped into Leicester square, and chased out by the cats, or an insane snipe feeding in the kennel and so advanced warily, and almost ashamed myself a Fellow of the Zoological Society, elected by acclamation for my famous paper—"Some Observations on Erratic Instinct." I paused behind his tail, and looked intently on the pavement to which he pointed, but saw nothing. "No, so! Ponto! So! good dog!" He stirred not, but gave a hideous leer with his one eye, just as you see a staunch fellow do when the old cock is under your muzzle. "Come, sir, go 'long! Ha! you rascal, what are you at?" Not a stir. I pushed him with a large but he resisted manfully, and kept his point like a bronze statuette. I looked again: before me was the pavement, beyond it the railings. "By Jove, there is a hare inside," and there, sure enough, I beheld a very fine cat, with back erect and swelled tail, prepared for the defensive. She would not stir, neither would Ponto. I poked at the cat with my cane, but she did not mind it, as I could not reach her. I hit Ponto, but I might as well have hit the wall. Suddenly a policeman came round the corner; the cat flew from her hiding-place; Ponto bolted by like the shadow of a cloud. I never saw him more. His confirmed bad habits had ruined his last chance of recovering station and position in life!

Another time, I foregathered with a respectable looking colley, very much like a covenanting minister—he had lost his tail and part of one ear, and I pitied him for the persecutions he had undergone—most likely for conscience sake. He was sleekly demure—his coat thread- or rather hair—bare, but neatly brushed. He passed gravely along the street, picking out the crossings with great neatness, stopped for me rigidly at every corner. He was generally indifferent to cats, and had a decided contempt for the other pariahs he encountered; so I stole him in quietly, and put him down in the kitchen. He wagged his tail, and crept into an empty bucket, with a look in his face that said as plainly as words could—"never fear, I see what you're up to—no barking. I'll keep dark." In the morning I felt some uneasiness, in going down to the breakfast table, at my improper conduct, and wished cursorily, in case that he would creep out as if he had got in by accident. There was no sign of him. His ingratitude was soon discovered. He had eaten a cold shoulder of mutton (for which, I own, I felt infinitely obliged to him), had drank the morning's milk, and gobbled up 2lbs. of fresh butter, a present from Devonshire. How he got out I know not. To this moment my wife believes that a band of cut-throats held their nocturnal orgies in our kitchen that night, and devoured our substance. I have wisely held my tongue, but I believe that miscreant to have been a burglar, and to have been a friend of "cracksmen." I could speak for ever of the canines I have met. It would do P. B. Willis great service to know some of them, and I leave him to introduce them to the world. One thing I must say we should try to reform them. I never encountered one decidedly bad character but the Scotch colley, and most likely he was depraved by associating with his masters, the drovers. Heaven help the wretches, and those who are like them. What sad stories could their tongues tell us, were they once loosed! But is there one the veriest cur of them all, mangy, starved, kicked, cuffed, sick, hooted, houseless, and despairing—that must not feel a delightful thrill of revenge and satisfied hate, night after night, as he sees the human pariahs walking through the streets as desolate, as uncared for as himself?

W. H. R.

THE PHILOSOPHER AND HER FATHER.

A sound came booming through the air—
"What is that sound?" quoth I.
My blue-eyed pet, with golden hair,
Made answer, presently,
"Papa, you know it very well
That sound—it was Saint Pancras Bell."

"My own Louise, put down the cat,
And come and stand by me;
I'm sad to hear you talk like that,
Where's your philosophy?
That sound—attend to what I tell—
That sound was not Saint Pancras Bell."

"Sound is the name the sage selects
For the concluding term
Of a long series of effects,
Of which that blow's the germ.
The following brief analysis
Shows the interpolations, Miss.

"The blow which, when the clapper slips,
Falls on your friend, the Bell,
Changes its circle to ellipse,
(A word you'd better spell),
And then comes elasticity,
Restoring what it used to be.

"Now, making it a little more,
The circle shifts about.
As much as it shrunk in before
The Bell, you see, swells out;
And so a new ellipse is made.
(You're not attending, I'm afraid).

"This change of form disturbs the air,
Which in its turn behaves
In like elastic fashion there.
Creating waves on waves,
Which press each other onward, dear,
Until the outmost finds your ear.

"Within that ear the surgeons find
A tympanum, or drum,
Which has a little bone behind,
Malleus, it's called by some;
But those not proud of Latin Grammar,
Humbly translate it as the hammer.

"The wave's vibrations this transmits
On to the incus bone,
(Incus means anvil, which it hits),
And this transfers the tone
To the small os orbiculare,
The tiniest bone that people carry.

"The stapes next—the name recalls
A stirrup's form, my daughter—
Has three half circular canals,
Each filled with limpid water;
Their curious linings, you'll observe,
Made of the auditory nerve.

"This vibrates next—and then we find
The mystic work is crown'd;
For then my daughter's gentle Mind
First recognises sound.
See what a host of causes swell
To make up what you call 'the Bell.'"

Awhile she paused, my bright Louise,
And ponder'd on the case;
Then, setting that he meant to tease,
She slapp'd her father's face.
"You bad old man, to sit and tell Such gibberygosh about a Bell!"

MISS JULIA SPLASHTON TO MISS MARY MEEK.

OAKDALE HALL, CHESHIRE.
Monday.

MY DEAREST POLLY,

You will be surprised to find me dating from here instead of Peckham; but I have so much to tell you, I don't know where to begin. My dear girl, don't tell your mamma, or she won't let you come and see me; but I have been hunting, and carried off the brush that means the fox's tail. You know I was old Gauntlet's favourite pupil at Brighton, and you were a shocking coward; but I must begin at the beginning.

The papa of our old school-fellows, Clara and Jane Beaton—you must remember him; rather a handsome man, with a large frill to his shirt, who used to come to see them in a yellow gig, and bring most delicious tarts from Birch's, has done something wonderful in the Great Isabella Mines and the Trinchinopoly Railroad—made an enormous fortune. Every body at Peckham adores him; my aunt Faddy speaks of him with tears in her eyes, and papa, in his grand way, calls him "a most important member of the financial-cracy." He has moved from Peckham to Hyde Park gardens, and bought this beautiful place from Sir Francis Fastman, who has gone abroad for his health!

Clara and Jane asked me down to spend Christmas with them. Oh, my dear, I wish you had been with us; such fun. Papa made a very handsome present for my winter wardrobe; he was rather proud of the invitation. I bought a new riding habit—one of the new hats, a brown Garibaldi, with a plume so becoming—and Mademoiselle Gentili did wonders. My dress bonnet was pink satin and velours epinglé. I wore it at church yesterday, and every body turned round. Then the sweetest morning dress, quite new: a douillette blue foulard, made in a loose jacket, waistcoat with silver buttons, and plain full shirt with silver buttons down the front; a cambric collarette, and a delicious white silk neck-tie, embroidered in blue and silver. My aunt Faddy gave me two little pets of caps, of Paris point, and old Monsieur Grimenprez, papa's Lyons correspondent, a pair of slippers, for what the impudent old fellow called my mignon feet, of maize-coloured velvet, trimmed with ermine—so exquisite, they would really make you scream. Among my evening dresses I have a black lace, with white lace flowers, in which Tom Beaton declares I look like an angelic ostrich.

I took little fat Sally, our cook's niece, for a maid, and went down on a hard frosty day by railroad. Clara and Jane promised to meet me with a carriage at the station, which is ten miles from Oakdale. Judge my surprise, when set down at the little wilderness of a road-side station, at finding no Clara or Jane, but Mr. Tom Beaton, all great coats and shawl, with a cigar and an apology—his sisters had been tired out at a ball the night before he had just returned from hunting, and had only time to jump into his mail phaeton and get down in time to meet the train. I was so much surprised that I allowed myself to be bustled into the phaeton, and wrapped in a great bear-skin, almost without a word, while a servant with a spring cart took charge of Sally and the luggage.

My dear Polly, did you ever ride in a mail phaeton? My aunt used to say it was not a proper carriage for a young lady, but I assure you it is extremely nice.

In a minute Mr. Tom Beaton was beside me, the groom let go the horses' heads, and away we went. The new moon shone out over the hedges and fields, all silver white with the hoar frost—the wheels crunched with a quick, dull sound over the hard road—the pole chains rattled—the horses pulled and snorted away with a fierce stamp, stamp—and for the first mile my companion did not say much, so busy was he holding them in, while I, cuddled up in my corner, with my muff to my face, answered only in monosyllables. Rushing through the moonlight, while the shadows of our swift horses travelled still more swiftly before us, the icicles sparkled from the sprays on the hedges, like diamond drops; and the mist, rolling up from each broad field we passed, closed up the view in clouded mystery. Fast, fast we dashed along the high road, past straggling carts, the carters crying cheerily, "good night, master;" past white cottages, half shrouded in dark gleaming evergreens; through a turnpike, where the man stood to bow, so unlike London turnpike men, quick turning into a dark lane, through a thick wood, where the rabbits dashed under the horses' feet from side to side, and I thought of bears and robbers. It was delightful! Once, just after splashing through a little half frozen stream, an echo from a neighbouring hill sent back the ringing of the chains, the whir of the wheels, and the tramping of our steeds in a strange medley, like echoes from fairy land. My dear Polly, one hour of such a ride is worth a whole season of "the lady's mile" in Hyde Park, at funeral pace, in a fly brougham.

At length we reached the lodge of Oakdale Park. The gates were open, and we galloped up the winding avenue beneath great branching trees, and came out on the sweet lodge Oakdale Manor—a mansion such as we dream of in dreams and read about in novels, with black and white timbered walls and huge peaked gables, large enough to lodge an army.

But there was no time for studying architecture in one minute the doors opened, I was lifted out, and put down in a broad low wainscoted hall, in front of a huge staircase of black oak, and in the next out came Clara and Jane, Mrs. Beaton, all smiles and black velvet, Mr. Beaton, in a white waistcoat, with a dinner napkin in his hand, and a crowd of servants. It was like a scene in a pantomime. The house was full of visitors; so, as I had no idea of appearing to disadvantage, not being one of the sad and sickly ones, I pleaded a headache, and got leave to stay in my room, have a cup of tea, and to bed.

I can't tell you this time all the fun we had, every day and night—polking, and charades, and blindman's buff, and Christmas games: riding out, skating, coursing, and feeding the pheasants. Tom Beaton found out that I was the best horsewoman of the party, except an Irish widow, a dear dashing delightful creature, Mrs. O'Moran; and Friday last it was fixed we should all go to see the foxhounds meet at Dyrlingham, four miles off. He made me give my pretty horse to Jane, promising I should ride Orion, the best old hunter in the county, he assured me.

The night before I could scarcely sleep for thinking of the sport. I got out of bed several times to see that it was not a frost. Really, Polly, I ought to have been a boy. I have a great mind to be a Bloomer. The morning was lovely, cloudy, and rather warm—just the thing, Tom said; a south wind scarcely rustled the dry leaves in the Park.

Breakfast seemed as if it would never be over. The old sportsmen fed steadily, the young ones rushed about frantic for boots, spurs, and gloves, not to be found.

When the horses came round, we had every sort, from little Mary Beaton's Shetland to young Bob Harkaway's vicious chesnut thoroughbred. But I was dreadfully disappointed when my Orion came out. Imagine a great big brown horse, with very little mane, bony, and angular; his legs all over scars, walking so deliberately, that it seemed as if the groom was obliged to pull him along, while half the other horses were prancing, rearing, and squealing. The only good points were bright eyes and thin, sleek, shiny coat. I could not help crying, "Well, Master Tom, you seem determined to make me a figure."

Tom, who was just helping Laura Giggles on her pony, only laughed, and said, in his rough way, "You can't change now; but you will find Orion all right."

Once in motion, every one was in spirits. The frost had disappeared; the pasture fields had a mellow tone; the robins sang out cheerily from the leafless trees; the purple-necked pheasants fed close to the road side without fear, or fluttered heavily up as we passed; the partridges cowered down beside clods of earth; from cross roads and bye-lanes horsemen and carriages of sporting out joined or passed our cavalcade; and far over the fields, bits of pink, which gradually swelled into full-grown red-coated well-mounted men, came towards us, slowly leaping hedges, or opening the gates of bridle roads; jolly farmers in green, brown, and black cords, and tops, or gaiters, on serviceable rough nags, flocked in from their homesteads; lots of pedestrians, in smock frocks and wide-awakes over brown rosy faces, with ash sticks in hand, trotted along in great glee, all bound for the "meet." We were all in good humour—we cantered beside the carriages—we forgot our dignity, and said "good morning" to every one; even Mr. Chrysolite, the great critic from London, who hates hunting and everything of sort that cannot be performed on boards, by gaslight, thawed as he looked out of the barouche, and remarked that a scarlet coat on a gray horse, passing by a holly garden hedge at a distance on our right, made "a very nice bit of colour." Thus trotting and pacing we reached the straight avenue that leads to Colonel Egret's house. Imagine a square stone house, of not very ancient date, sheltered by a semicircular mound, covered with the finest laurels and red berried arbutus; in front, and spread over the little park, nearly a hundred horses, some led, some mounted; on one side, in a circle kept clear, the huntsman, an old thin bright-eyed wiry man, on a fine bay mare, much like the one I was riding, surrounded by his hounds; while the two whips—one the huntsman, one his son—rode round and kept them in order.

When the signal was given for moving, one of the whips rode first, then followed the huntsman with the hounds, then the other whip, and then the crowd, from Lord Strathdale, on the finest hunter in the world, stirrup to stirrup with Jack Jobson, the apothecary's apprentice, on his 15*l*. Galloway. Crash, crash we went, the pebbles flying, at a sharp trot up a narrow lane: but way was politely made for the ladies.

The covert to be drawn, that is to say, where we were to find the fox, lay in a deep gorge, a sort of grove of trees and brushwood, surrounded by a great hedge and ditch, intersected by a stream, which, on leaving the covert, meandered through a long vale of meadows, as we could see for a long distance. The carriages were drawn up on the brow of a grass-hill; the horsemen dispersed in patches round the covert—some got finely scolded for being in the way. Tom Beaton brought up an old groom to me and Mrs. O'Moran, and said, "These ladies can ride better than the rest, so I wish you to let them see as much as possible of course, if we take the vale, they can't follow." As he spoke, the huntsman leaped the fence of the covert, the hounds dashed in before him, and spread: we could see them, here and there, their tails waving above the long dry grass. There was a silence for a few minutes, the hounds, all but one or two, disappeared; gentlemen chatting and smoking; then came a sharp shrill cry from a hound; then the huntsman cried, "Hark to Echo!" with such a voice! then the other hounds all joined, and we could see them below us, rushing round close to the hedge; then they were silent, only now and then a low whimpering cry from a single hound. My horse pricked up his ears,—the sportsmen gathered up their reins, and threw away their cigars; then came a grand crash of the hounds,—"Tally-ho! away!" cried a green-coated farmer. Down the steep hill, at full speed, toward a monstrous hedge and ditch, leading to the valley, rode a score of horsemen; at the further end of the cover we could see the hounds leaping out, and, with one cry, away over the green valley at our feet. The huntsman crashed through the bushes, leaped the hedge and ditch that surrounded the covert at a standing jump, and, blowing his horn, followed at full speed, half a-dozen of the best mounted scarlet and green were soon at his heels, others galloped wildly about, looking for easy places to get to them, or avoid the brook, soon to be crossed. "We shall never see them again," said the road-riders, "if they keep to the valley."

As I sat staring with all my eyes, the old groom said, "This way, Miss," and, in a moment, we were galloping, at full speed, along the high ground, forming the arc of the bow the hounds and hunters were traversing below us. When we passed the cover we saw them once or twice; soon sight and sounds were lost, but our guide seemed to know his line, led the way through gaps, opened gates, and pulled down rails, with extraordinary agility for so old a man, while I found Orion as tractable as a pony, very fast, and easy to sit. To our fears, he answered shortly, "If they don't kill below, he (the fox) will make for Red Hill gorse, and we shall be there first Miss, never fear." So field after field was passed, up and down through farm-yards, then along lanes, a few knowing fat farmers following "old Tom Pelham," and, after about half-an-hour's riding, without taking a leap beyond a little ditch or two, as we came up a narrow lane where there was a great waggon full of straw stopping up all the way, we saw the hounds slowly crossing before us, and come to a check in a field full of sheep on our left. By this time I, in impatience and courage were at boiling point; Mrs. O'Moran, who is a splendid horsewoman, began to talk with more Irish accent, and her cheeks glowed. While we were dead locked in the lane, the hounds spreading and questing about, the huntsman followed, his horse all foam, called his hounds to him, led them on to another field ("made a cast" is the term). The dear things went snuffing about. Tom Beaton, Harkaway, Lord Strathdale, an Irish parson, and two farmers came up; the next minute, with just one cry, the hounds streamed away. A great ditch and blackthorn-hedge lay between us; the only open place was where a plank led to a high double footstile; as Tom Beaton passed, standing up in his stirrups, crying, "Tally-ho! forward—forward!" Mrs. O'Moran said, "I can't stand this, my dear,—you stay with the groom. Come up, my Beauty!" and she was over the stile; before I knew what I was about I gave Orion his head, and he followed; oh! how frightened I was when he rose in the air, but he dropped on his feet like a deer. Some one cried out with amazement; the next moment the old groom was at my side, saying, as we raced along, "Sit back, Miss, and don't touch the curb-rein." Away we went, over broad pastures, Mrs. O'Moran leading the way, taking hedges, and turf-banks, and ox-rails, as straight as a line. About two fields a-head were the hounds, and the gentlemen were separated from us, on a parallel line, by high inclosures, their horses more tired than ours. On we flew, flying is the only word. I lost my whip and one glove, my back hair tumbled down, I felt that my horse, so strong, so light, bounding as if on steel springs,—could do anything. The old groom was ready in a moment to open a gate; through a small wood we galloped, by a bridle road, a steep down hill, muddy and narrow, the branches scratching our faces,—the hounds scarcely pausing, but just whimpering, and then away,—out we came upon a broad, long, sloping field, where we could see a brook, zig-zagging at the bottom. As we got outside, the leading hounds were climbing the opposite bank; about a dozen out of the whole field were scattered before us. "Hold hard, Miss," cried old Pelham. "Come along," cried the Irish widow, "we'll show them the way." I was mad—I was ready for anything. Down we went, racing over the sloping turf; as we came up I had an indistinct vision of two or three velvet caps floundering in the brook. I gave a loud scream, and the next moment Orion was landed on the opposite side, clear over Mr. Harkaway and his chesnut. With that effort my strength seemed to fail, my eyes swam, my chest heaved; I was wearied, but I would not give in. Up the opposite hill we went about a mile, fortunately, the fences were easy. Tom Beaton rode beside me, scolding a little, but I made no answer; crossing a turf-bank, half-a-dozen yards from the hounds, and a hundred from a gorse cover, we caught sight of the white-tipped brush of the fox. The next moment the crash of the hounds, and the whoo-whoop of the huntsman, told the tale. I got over the last fence, how, I know not; I saw the huntsman with the dead fox in his hands; I heard Mrs. O'Moran say something to Lord S., pointing to me; the next moment, I am ashamed to own it, I slipped from my horse, and fainted. Tom Beaton just caught me in time.

But it was only momentary. I revived after a drink from Lord Strathdale's silver flask, in time to see so many coming up at full speed from all sides, that it was a wonder where they had been. I rode home in one of the carriages, and got a good scolding, it was very naughty, but very nice. Tell me, my dear Polly, was not this a famous Christmas game. I should so like to live in the country. But it is getting late; I have filled my paper. Adieu, my dear girl, and don't scold your Tom-boy friend. Write soon.

Your affectionate
JULIA.

P.S.—Tom Beaton, who has been looking over my shoulder, says I shall live in the country if I like, and ride Orion every week in the season. Will you be bridesmaid, my dear?

THE SQUANDERS OF SQUANDER CASTLE:

BY WILLIAM CARLETON, Author of "Traits and Stories of the Irish Peasantry," "The Black Prophet," "Mave," &c. &c.

ILLUSTRATED BY F. W. TOPHAM.

* Nothing extenuate, nor set down aught in malice"

CHAPTER I.—How I came to Educate Mr. Squander's "Whelps."

The history, both natural, moral, social, and domestic, of the Squanders, of Castle Squander, is one with which Providence, for purposes very agreeable and disastrous to myself, thought fit to make me acquainted. I am the son of a man who was, for some years, a bailiff upon the Castle Squander property; and, having been gifted with an apt apprehension for picking up knowledge, and a rather extensive imagination, concatenated with a strong affection for field sports—and, indeed, for sport of every description—I soon began to be looked upon as a rather remarkable youth. I received my education on the sunny side of a plantation seminary, or what the vulgarians of the country term a hedge-school. The master of this school was a very remarkable man, as an English and classical didactic. His name was O'Shaughran, which signifies "a man on the stray," and, indeed, he was seldom off it; being as genuine a specimen of the peripatetic school as ever a learned vagabond in the records of old Greece itself. There was scarcely a county in Ireland into which he had not made wide incursions, conquering, like Alexander, all the literary opponents that came in his way, and either making them knock under, or, in case of resistance, banishing them from the place of their jurisdiction, or, as he called it himself, "evanishing into thin air."

THE HEDGE SCHOOLMASTER.

"Gintlemen," he would often say, "sobriety and learning are two things altogether incompatible. Poetry and poteen are both derived from the same root—pōico, facio, to make, to build, to construct. The human brain is a dead letter, until it is irradiated and vivified by 'the genuine.' Here am I now, the most celebrated classical didactic, and the greatest Philomath in Ireland, and yet, without the poteen, my head is nothing but a well-stored granary under lock and bar; or a fountain sealed up, of which poteen may be considered the key; for the moment it is applied the granary is open—the fountain is unsealed, and those who hunger and thirst after knowledge may feed and drink abundantly. Randy O'Rollick approach, sine metu. I cherish large expectations from you, Randy; taking your juvenile years into question, you have distinguished yourself oftener by drinking draughts of the true Pierian than any condiscipulus I ever had under my care. Go on, therefore, and prosper, Randy; get your inspiration from that which eschews the gauger—bad luck to him!—and you will be heard of yet.

> 'There's great old Homer,
> That fine old poemer,
> 'Twasn't in St Omer's he sucked it in;
> The thundering rhymer,
> Got always a primer
> From copious draughts of the true poteen.'

Randy, there's a poculum there beyant, with a drop of the optima crestaa in it: will you hand it hether? Thanks, Randy; ago tibi gratias, Randy. Propino tibi salutem, Randy; and, here's that you may rise to celebrity yet!"

It is not to be supposed that, under the tuition and example of such a man, I did not make a suitable progress. Mr. O'Shaughran always, as was then the custom, went round to the houses of his wealthiest pupils at night, and, among the rest, he did not neglect to pay my father a visit. Now my father—though a bailiff upon the Castle Squander property—was a man well to do in the world. Indeed, in the good old times, it sometimes happened that the bailiff, if a smart and knowing man, and with a naso adunco to business, succeeded in elevating himself through all the usual gradations of office until he found himself acting, pleno velo, in the full and unlimited capacity of agent. Or, if he felt that, from want of education, he himself was incapable of that glorious uprise, he not unfrequently got one of his sons—of course the cleverest and most roguish of them—indoctrinated into the pure and transparent profession of an attorney. This, together with an appropriate inoculation by his father into all the nice tricks and plausible iniquities connected with the management of property, gave the young scion a profound and copious knowledge of the business of an agent, by which he contrived to advance himself gradationally, until, in some instances, the property got into what is called a transition state, and ultimately passed all through his own kindness and friendly aid—from its original owners into his own hands.

O'Shaughran, then, knowing that my father enjoyed a good deal of local celebrity for excellent housekeeping, and that he was seldom without a good bottle of the true Pierian, took a peculiar fancy not only to myself, but expressed a warm friendship for the whole family at large. In fact, I often thought there was a conspiracy between him and a circulating saltator of a dancing-master against my father's hung-beef, bacon, and whiskey; but in an especial manner against the whole body of our domestic ornithology. The plot between the two scheming thieves was as follows:—Paddy Dogherty, as great a little rebel as ever walked put him on the triangles, where he used to consider it as an amusement, and make faces at the drummers and other officers about him, as if the whole thing was only a piece of fun—and devil a thing else it was to him. At long last the Government found it was too expensive to be eternally whipping him, without effect; for they lost more in cat-o'-nine tails than ever they gained by his punishment. He had got a line out of some great writer, which he kept repeating to the drummers while flogging him—

> "Lay on, Macduff,
> And damned be he who first cries, hold, enough!"

Lord Cornwallis, who happened to be present on one of these occasions, was so much struck with the little fellow's courage that he gave him a pass, written by his own hand, and a guinea to boot; after which the tiny rebel danced the "Little House under the Hill" upon one of the drum-heads, to show his gratitude.

Well, as I said, he kept his dancing-school in my father's barn, where he had a great many pupils; but he did not confine himself to mere dancing; he also taught, what has since been termed, "deportment"—a devilish difficult piece of science, as I have been given to understand. His deportment embraced, perhaps, a greater variety of accomplishments than ever was comprehended within the prospectus of the most fashionable French Professor. He taught the girls, for instance, the most fashionable method of kissing; and how they were to kiss, more or less, according to the hold which the gentlemen kissing them had upon their affections. His two great principles, however, as they affected either sex were:—first, that for females—which consisted in teaching them how "to hold up their heads, and walk proud like the ladies. The other consisted in teaching the young frieze-coats "how to carve like gintlemen." Here now was where our ornithology suffered in this point, having the conspiracy I spoke of between himself and the schoolmaster. This last lesson was a purely domestic one—and a great proof of his condescension and regard for those to whom he vouchsafed to disclose it. In giving it, he suffered himself to fall, as it were, from the dignity of his profession; but he cared not—his anxiety was to make "ladies" of his female pupils, and "gintlemen" of the frieze-coats.

"Harry Halloran," he would say to the son of some rude but wealthy farmer, "have your best turkey ready to morrow, with punch and a bottle of wine, for I will carve and do the honours wid you. I will show you what is meant by High Life and Mathematics; or, in other words, what is known and practised by the quality as the polite Science of Carvation."

My poor mother, who had a high strain in her, felt delighted at this opportunity of getting her daughters taught "to walk proud, like the ladies;" and my father, the bailiff, who had an eye to an agency, in the distance, for some of us, felt equally anxious that we should know something of high life and mathematics; the mathematics having consisted in the most scientific method of carving a fowl—a hint which the dancing-master had received from O'Shaughran, the Philomath; who, with the aid of some old cookery-book, contrived to reduce the operation to a geometrical problem.

At all events, such was Buckrambuck's love for this agreeable scheme, that, so far as fowl were concerned, he cleared out the poultry-yards of almost every farmer in the neighbourhood; and were it not that my worthy father, as bailiff of the Castle Squander property, was supplied with an incredible number of fowl from the unfortunate tenants—in the shape, among more substantial tokens, of bribes—I don't think that even we could have supplied him with subjects for his "High Life and Mathematics."

This, however, was not all. O'Shaughran was always sure to come on these occasions with the aforesaid oil-in-kery book in his pocket; and, having pulled it out, and placed it before me and my brothers whilst Buckrambuck was operating, he pointed out to us what he termed the great Gastronomic Problem—which he said consisted in carving the fowl according to the principles discovered by that great philosopher Captain Cook.

Heaven help us! In what a beautiful and intellectual state was the country at that time—when everyone of us, young and old, looked upon these two men as each infallible in his way!

I know there are several societies, both in England and Ireland, for the Insurance of Lives—which I conceive to be a fraud upon the public in general; as I don't suppose that one single society of them—any more than all of them put together—could extend a man's life beyond the moment appointed by Providence for his death. Be this, however, as it may, I am of opinion, that if such an extension were possible, there are in existence no two individuals who require the benefit of such societies more than an Irish Bailiff and an Irish Landlord—pardon me, I forgot the Irish Agent. My poor father was a good, kind man in his own family; but, somehow or other, he had contracted, from the habit of his profession, that kind of instinct which we may notice in the hound, when the scent of an unfortunate and inoffensive hare comes in his way. Pity, compassion, sympathy, or fellow-feeling for those against whom he had his writ of ejectment, or any other of those various documents by which he was usually authorised to act, were to him principles which he could not understand. The spirit of his employment, and his anxiety to gratify those who had selected him for it, had so completely hardened his heart, that, if he felt anything in the shape of conscience—anything that soothed and gratified it in the discharge of his duty—it was when he had cast a sharper and more inhuman spirit into the discharge of that duty. In point of fact, I think his conscience was completely averted: for, if ever he experienced anything like regret or remorse, it was for some over-indulgence to the wretched people, or some opportunity for further peculation which he had inconsiderately let slip him. To effect his caption, or the execution of his writ, in the most complete manner, without reference to the circumstances of the individual or the family on whom he pounced—without reference to sex—to age—to sickness—or even to insanity itself—was what he looked upon as constituting his merit and his duty.

And yet it is surprising to think how the people liked him! Yes, liked him! Certainly they must have liked him, or how could it have come to pass that he was uniformly treated with such wonderful kindness and respect? How could it happen that any man whom they detested should have received so many fat geese, turkeys, ducks, and fowl of every description; so many bags of oats; so many miscauns of butter, young pigs, and various other et cetera of that kind? Yes, I maintain it, my father was a popular man. In fair and in market he was treated as such. How frequently in these places has he been asked in to drink with the tenantry, and forced to partake of the best the house could furnish; and that even by those who were a little behind in their rent, and who could, consequently, least afford it! No—upon further reflection, I maintain it—my father must have been a feeling and a kind-hearted man; for I can assure you, gentle reader, that on these occasions, when the unhappy people were committing many a doleful narrative of their hard situations to his kind confidence, he treated them with such a degree of sympathy, and promised to intercede for them with the landlord, and get them time—with such an honest and unquestionable sincerity that they have kept blessing him, and bribing him—the latter at his own benevolent suggestion—until he was found to come down upon them at one full swoop; and if he was harsh then, and forgot all his friendship—all his promises—all their bribes—all his sympathy—was it not in the discharge of his duty? No; I do not think there ever was a more popular bailiff—only that one night, after having levied an execution on the furniture, cattle, and hag yard of a sick, but honest family, he preferred staying out, instead of returning to his own house that night. Neither did he come home in the morning—nor at noon—nor at night again; and it was only after a search of three days that he was found in a copse of hazel, with two additional "solutions of continuity," as the surgeons say, in his head, more than ever Nature had originally placed there. In other words, the poor, kind hearted man, who was so well beloved by the people, and loaded with so many substantial tokens of their regard, was forced to die an extempore death, without priest or friar, judge or jury, having received a bullet right through the head; and such was the end of my poor father.

My mother, on the contrary, was not indeed such a wife to him as she ought to have been. Many a time after his return home, boasting of the success with which he had executed his mission against some unfortunate family, has she risen up,—but this was when we were poor, and bringing a noggin of buttermilk, dashed it between his eyes, exclaiming—

"You hardened vagabone!—why do you take delight in the misery of these unfortunate people? Why don't you throw up your situation, and stick to your honest industry? Why will you let yourself become a tool of the devil in the hands of any landlord? Do you remember—can you forget—what we suffered when the bailiffs were upon ourselves? Do you remember Frank M'Murt's conduct, and his treachery to us, after all the presents we sent him? And yet you'll allow yourself to become an instrument of hell in the hands of these Squanders, of Castle Squander, to harrish your fellow-creatures? Faugh upon you! But mark the end of it. Ah! you give notice by the way to these poor creatures; but, take my word for it, that if you don't act in a milder and kinder spirit, your death will be without notice."

My father never answered her, for he was a mild man at home; but he used to wink at us. And then, after getting in the whiskey bottle, he would sit down, very comfortably, and take two or three tumblers of punch.

This was fair enough; but then we always had a second quarrel; for, when he began to get maudlin and moistened, he used to express pity for the creatures that had been turned out or ruined. Then my mother, who, as I said, was of a high strain, thought worse of this than she did of the other; and, God knows, many a malivogueing she gave him, for what she called, "his harpocrisy."

For some years this went on; but, as my mother saw the means and circumstances of the family increasing, and knew that every act of rapacity and fraud on the part of my father, went to fill his pockets, it was wonderful how gradually she softened the tone of her rebukes, until ultimately she had actually imbibed and identified herself with his spirit.

"Poor creatures," she would say, "we know they are to be pitied, no doubt; but, then, on the other hand, one must do their duty."

Such, however, is life; and such, too often, the strength of human virtue, when opposed to temptation.

After my father's death matters began to retrograde a good deal, and I must say that a large portion of my mother's sorrow for the poor man who had received an ejectment out of life without notice, was occasioned as much by the cessation of those handsome perquisites which he squeezed out of the unfortunate tenantry, as by his simple loss. She was, at this time, what is called, in Ireland, a comely shaoolagh widow, and in six months or so after the sad event I have just narrated, began to throw her eye about for a second husband. This was evident from her neglect of the family, and a more than usual attention to the decoration of her person; her dress, indeed, exhibited more show than taste, and caused a good deal of satire and amusement among the neighbours. She now began to attend fairs and markets, although she had no earthly business at them, unless very rarely. Her affection also for our neighbours, and her sympathy for their bereavements, increased so much, that, I'll be bound to say, a single wake did not take place for miles around at which she was not present. Now, as there is no meeting of any kind so remarkable for fun and courting as an Irish wake where sorrow is fairly smothered in mirth, I think we need not travel far to find out the cause of her sympathy for those who had lost their friends. Be this as it may, she was captivated by a species of Irish character, called a Sportheen, which means a frolicsome and amusing vagabond, who detests work and industry; attends every dance, wake, fair, race, and other place of diversion within his reach; carries his wealth and wardrobe on his back, and laughs, and drinks, and fights his pleasant way through the world.

To make a long story short, as the "divarting vagabond" wanted a hearth and feeding-place of his own, and finding that the bouncing widow had both, he made up to her; the negociations were short, as they always are where the parties are willing, and, in a brief space of time, she "metamurphied" the Sportheen blade into a stepfather.

Alas! alas! Here is where the unfortunate orphan is soon taught to draw the painful distinction between the spurious and the true, between the homely touch of nature, and the hollow heartlessness of self-interest and pretence. Our father, though hard in the heart as a Scotch whinstone, when executing his writs and decrees, was not, nevertheless, without strong touches of domestic affection, and loved his children so well that he had projected a little scheme of ambition for each. It was now, however, we missed him; it was now we perceived the startling and incredible change of which a woman's heart,—nay, even a mother's,—is capable, when she suffers any single passion to overcome her. The jolly, pleasant, rollicking sportheen, who had been, and still was, to others all laughter, jest, and light heartedness, was a most merciless and unfeeling tyrant to us, and evidently set his heart upon banishing us from the family. Young as we were, it was impossible to avoid suspecting this, and, after the birth of their first child, he no longer concealed his purpose. Every day, upon the slightest pretence, he beat us black and blue; but there is no evil without its good. His severity only knit our hearts and affections more closely together, and caused us to love each other with greater tenderness. My eldest sister was a beautiful and modest girl, and when I used to see the unoffending creature with a black eye, which was often the case, I swore that if God spared me, I would work a fearful revenge upon the smiling and unmanly villain who treated her with such barbarity.

I now felt that it was necessary to do something for myself, and, consequently, devoted every hour I could spare to self improvement. I had laid in a tolerably good stock of mathematics, with a fair share of Greek and Latin, and was gifted, besides, with a good natural intellect; but that which stood me most instead, was a superstition which originated from the well known fact that clever teachers were so completely debauched by the kindness and hospitality of the people that the effect was mistaken for the cause. Such, however, was the fact, nor is it yet wholly obliterated from the country.

One day, at this time, our landlord, Squire Squander, accompanied by his three slips of sons, having been out shooting, and the day being warm, happened to call in for a drink. My stepfather was in the house at the time, and the squire, having satisfied his thirst, sat down to rest.

"Well, Mrs. Murphy," said he, addressing my mother, for I should say that Murphy was the name of our vagabond stepfather, the sportheen, a circumstance which caused me to commit the little pun of meta-murphied above; "well, Mrs. Murphy," said he, "so you have got married again. This man, I suppose, is your husband?"

"Yes, your honour."

"Well, and is he a good husband to you?"

"Better never broke bread, your honour."

"Kind to your children, eh?"

"He's the moral (model) of a good husband, sir," (equivocating).

"This pretty girl one of your daughters, eh?"

"Yes, your honour."

"A very pretty girl—a very pretty girl, indeed; there Dick," said he, addressing the eldest, "what do you think of that bit o' goods, eh, my boy?"

"Her points are good; admirable, father; but, come here, my pretty girl."

My sister withdrew, for I need scarcely say that there was such a licentious leer in the eye of the young profligate as would cause any modest girl to avoid him.

"May be your honour," said my stepfather, "you and the young gintlemen would taste a drop of good spirits and water afther the fatigue of shootin? Troth, it was very stupid of me not to think of it before."

To this the squire made no reply.

"You shan't carry it off that way either," thought I, stepping forward. "Please, your honour, if you wish to know who gave my sister the black eye, there he stands, that smiling hypocrite; that cruel and cowardly scoundrel before you. It would be better for us to be dead, than lead the life we lead with him. There is not a week that my sister—that modest, inoffensive girl—has not a black eye from his hand. And now, sir, he is going to put us out of the house, upon the wide world, without shelter or protection."

"Come, come, come," said the squire. "Eh?—What is this? What is this? A bad business; come here, my girl; don't be afraid to speak. Is this true?"

"It's true, sir, every word of it," she replied, with a curtsey. "I couldn't tell your honour the life we lead with him."

"What do you say, Mrs. Murphy? You are their mother, eh? Is this true?"

"Never mind them, your honour," she replied. "A better stepfather never breathed; but, indeed, if you knew the treatment he gets, you'd wonder at his forbearance."

"Don't speake anything against the childre, at any rate," said the cowardly hypocrite. "I can bear enough, God knows, and do too, but say nothing against them."

"Come here, my girl," proceeded the Squire; "do you tell me, seriously and solemnly, in the presence of God, that it was this man here" (pointing to my stepfather) "who left you in this state?"

"In the presence of God, it was," she replied; "and the truth, your honour, is, that although he is driving us out of our own father's roof, and from our own father's property, we are not sorry for it. Beggary, starvation, or death itself, would be better than the life he leads us."

"Well," said the Landlord, "I am sorry to hear this; your father—one of the most useful and energetic officers I ever had—lost his life in my service; and I am bound to see that his children shall not be oppressed. Mr. Sportheen Murphy, I have heard of the treatment this young family receive at your hands; heard it from a hundred quarters—and, what is more, I am now satisfied of its truth. I came here, in fact, for that purpose. Now listen to me, you unmanly scoundrel—as the boy said the lease of this farm is out—so is your tenure of it. You must clear off; but these children shall remain in it. I do not wish to say anything harsh to your wife; but this property is neither hers nor yours—it belongs to them, and they shall have it. Cut your stick, then, you ruffian; I give you a month from this day, and if I find you here afterwards, out you go, without ceremony. I shall have notices served to-morrow. The furniture and everything else is to remain for the benefit of the children. Come, boys!"

As he spoke, the brow of Sportheen grew black as night; and I, who knew the spirit of vengeance and cruelty that was within him, began to fear for the Landlord; and the more so as I knew that the fellow was in the habit of being out whole nights, seldom making his appearance until early in the morning. Nor was this all. I once or twice observed about his throat and the roots of his hair traces of the stuff with which the White-boys* are in the habit of blackening their faces.

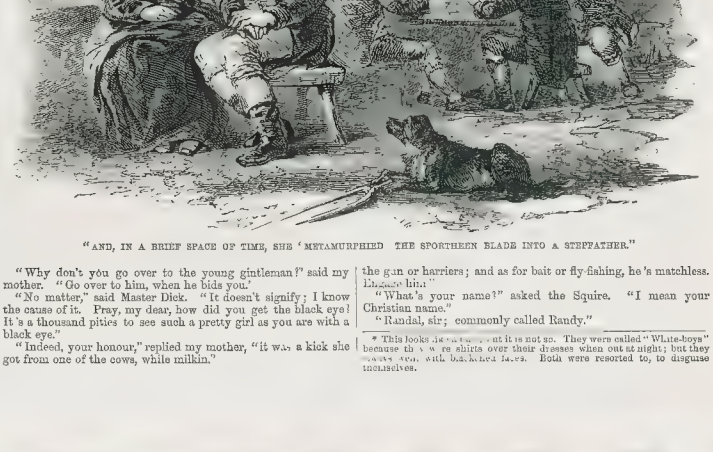
"Sir," said I, stepping forward, "we feel deeply indebted to you for your kindness; but, if you please, it is not our wish that you should push matters to such extremities. If the Sportheen here, will promise, in your presence, not to beat or annoy us any more, we would rather, for our mother's sake, that we should remain as we are. As for myself, I hope I'm able to earn my bread as a schoolmaster; the neighbours have promised to support me."

"Indeed!" said the Squire; "are you well educated?"

"Only comparatively speaking, sir," I replied. "I know a trifle of mathematics, and am not altogether ignorant of Latin and Greek."

"How!—how!"—he exclaimed—"do you tell me so? We are packing off a chap from Trinity College; as confounded a blockhead as ever opened a book. The parson—who was once a Fellow himself, and a devilish good fellow he is still—examined this worthy, and discovered his ignorance. Whatever he did know, instead of communicating it to my whelps, here, he amused himself in making love to my daughter. Off he goes to-morrow morning. Dick, what would you think of this young fellow for a tutor?"

"Deuce a better, father. He's worth any money out with



"AND, IN A BRIEF SPACE OF TIME, SHE 'METAMURPHIED' THE SPORTHEEN BLADE INTO A STEPFATHER."

"Why don't you go over to the young gintleman?" said my mother. "Go over to him, when he bids you."

"No matter," said Master Dick. "It doesn't signify; I know the cause of it. Pray, my dear, how did you get the black eye? It's a thousand pities to see such a pretty girl as you are with a black eye."

"Indeed, your honour," replied my mother, "it was a kick she got from one of the cows, while milkin."

the gun or harriers; and as for bait or fly-fishing, he's matchless. I know him."

"What's your name?" asked the Squire. "I mean your Christian name."

"Randal, sir; commonly called Randy."

* This looks like a disguise, but it is not so. They were called "White-boys" because they wore shirts over their dresses when out at night; but they always went with blackened faces. Both were resorted to, to disguise themselves.

"Randy," he repeated; "yes, that's far better than Randal—Randy rhymes with Brandy. I think I have heard of you. You love your drop, I'm told; isn't this he, Dick?" turning to the eldest

"The same," said Master Dick; "he's up to everything; from a needle to an anchor—from pitch and-toss to manslaughter. Isn't that so, Randy?"

"I have never committed manslaughter yet, sir," I replied, looking fiercely at my stepfather; "but I won't promise that I may not have it to answer for in another twelve months, if my sisters and brothers are not better treated."

"Call him out, Randy," said Master Dick; "course me, if you do, I'll furnish you both with the Point Blanks. I say, Murphy—or Sportheen, or whatever your name is—will you fight him with pistols, at twelve paces?"

"No," replied the Sportheen, who, in point of fact, was an arrant coward whenever he chanced to have his match before him; "I'll do no such thing."

"Well, then," replied the other, "I'll tell you what, if I ever hear thus you raise your hand to one of the family again, I give you my honour that I'll horse-whip you within an inch of your life; and as to this pretty girl, especially, if ever you injure a hair of her beautiful head, I'll make you smoke; so don't be afraid of him, my pretty lass. I'll be your protector!"

The father laughed heartily at this manifestation of Master Dick's gallantry.

"Bravo, Dick!" said he; "well done!—a chip of the old block, as sure as suds isn't claret. Do you hear, you Sportheen fellow?" he proceeded—nodding, however, towards the son "Mark his words you had better; for, upon my honour, if you maltreat these children again, he'll make them good; or, if he doesn't, I will. Come, boys!"

"But, about Randy, father?" said Master Dick. "Zounds! engage him. He'll be worth any money. It was he rode, and won, the match for Colonel Coppernose, upon Daddy long-legs, against M'Namara's Cannon ball."

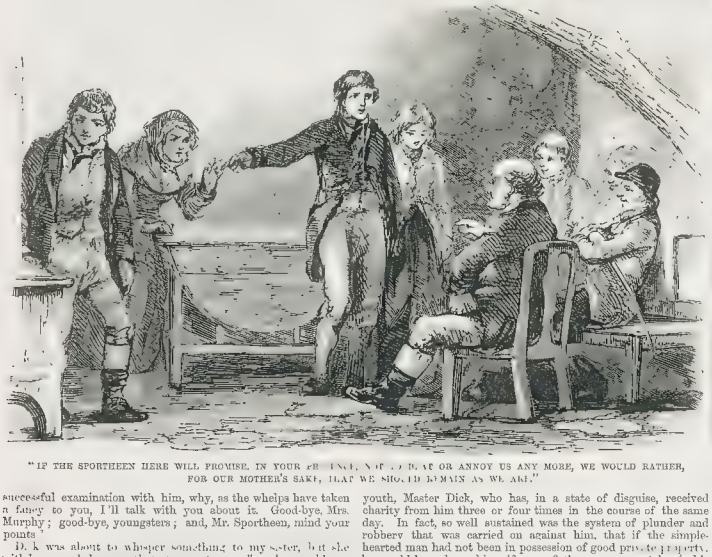
"I'll tell you what, then, Randy," said the Squire, addressing me; "come over to-morrow evening to the castle. Dr. M'Claret is to dine with us: he was once a Fellow of Trinity College; and they say, was then the devil at the bottle as he is now at the bottle. Come over, then, to-morrow evening, and if you stand a

"Well, he's as simple as a child, and will believe anything you tell him. Now, if you take a rise out of him, you will break my father's heart with fun. In the meantime, I have hid all the books, so that if he examines you at all, it must be from memory. Play him off now, Randy, will you?"

"I'll do my endeavour," I replied, corroborating my natural modesty with another glass. "I shall do my endeavour, Master Dick. In the meantime, lead me to him; show me the enemy, and, by the fame of the great O'Shaughran, he shall suffer

Potcen, when taken neat, as I then took it, bears comparisome all to nothing in rapidity of operation. In the course of a few minutes it diffuses a most delectable sensation throughout the whole system; makes the wit ready, the humour free and rich, the imagination prolific, the heart light and happy, and calls up all the faculties of the mind into their highest point of action. Accordingly, when I entered the parlour, I felt that the easy assurance with which Nature had originally gifted me, was so ably sustained and expanded by the potcen, that I would, at the time, have as soon faced the Provost ofOuld Trinity himself as the good-natured and simple parson whom I was about to encounter.

Dr M'Claret was rather tall and thin, with a complexion which it is very difficult to describe, inasmuch as I remember no particular colour, nor combination of colours, that could give the reader any notion of it. It had been, originally, pale, and, with certain exceptions, might almost be considered so still; yet a second glance would cause you to change that opinion. Sometimes you felt disposed to call it red, yet this impression disappeared as fast as the other. The face, in fact, seemed to be in that transition state which intimates the great struggle between the original hue of nature and that superinduced by indulgence, reminding one of the pale blush of morning twilight which characterises the eastern sky before the broad sun flushes it into triumphant purple. He was a calm quiet man, who spoke both lowly and slowly, of an extremely timid disposition, and so full of politeness and courtesy that he was always willing to concede his opinion rather than run the risk of displeasing you by contradiction. He was also exceedingly absent, and so credulous, that, as he never told a falsehood himself, so he took it for granted that every one else possessed an equal regard for truth. Many a prank was played off on him by the young Squanders, especially by that promising



"IF THE SPORTHEEN HERE WILL PROMISE, IN YOUR PRESENCE, NOT TO BEAT OR ANNOY US ANY MORE, WE WOULD RATHER, FOR OUR MOTHER'S SAKE, THAT WE SHOULD REMAIN AS WE ARE."

successful examination with him, why, as the whelps have taken a fancy to you, I'll talk with you about it. Good-bye, Mrs. Murphy; good-bye, youngsters; and, Mr. Sportheen, mind your points."

Dick was about to whisper something to my sister, but she withdrew, and he saw that it was "no go," as he would say himself. He then whispered me

"Don't be afraid of M'Claret, Randy: we'll take care and make him half drunk before he examines you. If he goes too deep, look fierce, swear, and ask him if he means to insult you. By this means you'll cow the soul within him; for he hasn't the heart of a rabbit."

The worthy Squire, attended by his whelps, as he called them, and a couple of servants, who had remained outside, then took their way home, or rejoined the sport; I really, at this distance of time, forget which—neither does it much signify to the reader.

CHAPTER II.

I AM EXAMINED—APPOINTED—AND COMMENCE MY DUTIES

THE next evening I accordingly repaired, as had been agreed upon, to Castle Squander, and on my name being sent in, Master Dick, in great good-nature met me

"Randy," said he, "we will have capital fun with M'Claret. He's an honest fellow enough, but in order to give you advantage, you must take a couple of glasses of brandy."

"Not brandy, Master Dick," I replied. "Give me the 'true Pierian.'"

"What do you mean by the true Pierian?" he asked. "That's a liquor I never heard of."

"Yes, Master Dick; and often imbibed it, like mother's milk, to my own personal knowledge; the succus hordei, sir,—the juice of the barley—the true poteen."

"Ho! ho!" said he, laughing. "Is that where you are, Randy, my man? Come along," he added, "we have three hogsheads of it in the end of the drawing-parlour, where my father makes a point to keep it, for a fortnight or three weeks, to give it what he calls 'a season.' However, we have dozens of it in the cellar, besides: follow me."

We accordingly repaired to the cellar, where he uncorked a bottle, whose fragrance—oh! it is perfectly useless to look out for a simile to illustrate it. The same fragrance should be felt, and the spirit which produced it tasted, in order to understand the full force of my meaning.

"Now," said Master Dick, "you know M'Claret's character, as well as I do; a good, kind-hearted, charitable, simple-minded parson, who gives away most of all he is worth to the poor. His only fault is that he loves a cup of liquor."

"Here's his health, Mr. Dick," said I; "don't call it a fault, and you'll oblige me."

youth, Master Dick, who has, in a state of disguise, received charity from him three or four times in the course of the same day. In fact, so well sustained was the system of plunder and robbery that was carried on against him, that if the simple-hearted man had not been in possession of good private property, he would have been, himself, one of the poorest wretches in his parish. Among others of his characteristics was a tendency to rebuke vice and give small infinitesimal expostulations in favour of religion and virtue, whenever he got maudlin; but these were always uttered with such blended timidity and courtesy, with such a troubling apprehension of giving offence, that they never failed to afford a very rich fund of amusement to the harassed crew for whose especial benefit they were delivered.

Of course, upon this occasion, I was dressed in my best apparel, which, between ourselves, was a little the worse of the wear; and were it not for my previous visit to the cellar, under the able auspices of Master Dick, I would have entered the dining-room with anything but the spirit of a hero. As it was, however, I felt no lack of assurance, as I said, for now that the artificial effrontery was added to the natural, I longed for the contest, especially as young Squander had given me an insight into the cowardly character of the parson. On entering, I found a company consisting of about eighteen or twenty individuals,—from the mellow Squireen, with his easy flaunt brogue, to the lord lieutenant of the county, including lawyers, officers of the army, the two sheriffs, the coroner, the gauger, not to omit several foxhunting gentry, who wore the scarlet coats, top boots, and buckskins. The scene was a noisy one indeed, and the atmosphere of the apartment, what with the united fumes of various wines and whiskey-punch, was almost enough, of itself, to denude a man of his solidity. My appearance had no other effect upon the Squire's guests than a stare or two from half-a-dozen of them, who once more fell into the noisy and turbulent stream of the conversation. The potations were certainly going on at a hard pace, as was evident from the frequent going out and in of the servants with fresh supplies of liquor.

"Father," said Master Dick, who was now permitted to do his duty as a man at the dinner-table, and to sit there as long as he pleased; "father," said he, "here is Randy coming to pass his examination with the parson."

"Ay!" exclaimed his father; "true, Dick. I had forgotten. Set him to the side-table, and let him have a stiff tumbler to strengthen his courage. Randy, did you drink anything stronger than water to-day, my boy—eh?"

"Punch didn't cross my lips to-day, sir," I replied; at which Master Dick clapped me on the back, and said, "Well done, Randy!—capital!"

The materials were then placed before me on the side-table, and, between Master Dick's exertions and mine in the concoction of the tumbler, I need scarcely say that it was a Nor'-wester. When it was finished, Dick would have had me take another, but I felt such a strong disposition to distinguish myself, and attract attention towards the display I was about to make, at the expense of the parson, that I resisted the solicitations added by certain symptoms about my head as to whether my position was, even then, one of perfect security. Be this as it may, the Squire, having got a hint from precious Master Dick that I was ready for the encounter, knocked on the table, to secure silence.

"Gentlemen," said he, "I beg your particular attention for a few minutes. Here is a young sprout, the son of O'Rollick, my bailiff, who, you must all remember, died a natural death one night about a couple of years ago."

"Pardon me, sir," said the Parson. "I trust you will excuse me; but, however, I fear I am interrupting you."

"Not at all, Doctor; proceed."

"No, no; I am certainly interrupting you."

"Devil a bit, Doctor; go on with your observation."

"Well then, since you permit me, I thought you said that your bailiff, O'Rollick, I think, died a natural death."

"Well, and so I did."

"Because it strikes me; but, perhaps it proceeds from a lapse of memory—indeed. I forget myself in—"

"Never, Doctor, when you have a jug of claret before you," observed Colonel Coppernose, with a laugh which pealed round the table

"Ah, Colonel," said one of the foxhunters; "the next time you survey yourself in a looking-glass your conscience ought to salute you for that observation that's, if you have such a thing."

"Thank you, sir," said the Parson, making him a bow of great suavity; "thank you very much. I feel indebted to you, sir, for a bumper of claret with you, sir; that was very well said, indeed. A purple nose, was it you said? I dare say you are right; but, unfortunately, I always laboured under the misapprehension that it was plain copper." An observation which, because it was made apparently in the simplicity of the good man's heart, turned the laugh completely against the Colonel, who enjoyed it himself as much as any of them.

"However, as I was saying," resumed the Parson, "it struck me that he was assassinated."

"And confound you, Doctor," replied the Squire, "don't you know that, in this country, assassination is the natural death of a bailiff?"

This occasioned another roar; the parson bowed an apology, begged pardon, as he had not been aware of the fact. "It is very odd, indeed, that it has escaped me. I must take a note of it. Assassination the natural death of a landlord; dear me, it is very odd indeed!" and he gently slipped down another bumper of claret, which he drank with that thorough sense of enjoyment which is exhibited by a luxuriant shutting of the eyes.

The fact is, many supposed the Doctor to be a kind of wag, in his way. For instance, he was in the habit of expressing his wonder at errors, things which he heard related, and of repeating them, as it were, to himself; but always with some curious blunder, which uniformly, whether by accident or design, involved something satirical, either against the speaker or the person spoken of. This habit of the Doctor's was the subject of much mirthful speculation—one class insisting that it was premeditated, whilst another ascribed it to his natural propensity to make mistakes. The point, however, proceed from what cause it might, was never definitively settled. I am myself of opinion that there lurked some sly satire and waggery under the worthy Doctor's simplicity.

"But, hang it, I didn't say landlord," replied the Squire.

"I believe, however," observed the Coroner, "that, of the two, the Doctor has gone nearer the truth."

"Well, no matter," said Squander, feeling a little uneasy; "it's rather an unpleasant subject—whilst we live, let's have it. Here, you Randy! Dick, have you the books? The examination, Doctor, to whom, as his father lost his life in my service, I'm determined to give the tuition of these whelps of mine, if he's found fit for it; and, for this purpose, I trust you will examine him, and report the result."

"You must examine him from memory, Doctor, I fear," said Dick; "I have searched the whole house for the books, and cannot find them. I suppose the Tutor must have put them aside, and he's gone to take his place in the coach, for to-morrow morning." On concluding, he winked at his father, who, in his turn, winked at the others—that they all were prepared for some humorous display was understood, as they knew it must be, by the Doctor's simplicity of character.

"It will be very difficult to examine him without books," observed the good-natured man; "and must be peculiarly disadvantageous to himself—poor boy. What course have you read, my good lad?"

To which I firmly replied, "'The Plantation Course' in Mathematics, and 'The Poteen Course' in Classics."

"Dear me," he exclaimed, "that is very odd—very odd, indeed. These are two courses which I have never heard of. Well—you are a mathematician, you say? but we shall see." And out he came with some confounded problem, of which, for the life of me, without pen and ink, I could make nothing.

I found myself in "a fix," as they say in America, and saw that I had nothing for it but to make a demonstration of a different kind. I accordingly asked him, in Irish, what was the last news from purgatory, and whether his honest father's soul was yet redeemed out of it; for it may be necessary to say here that the Doctor, though of a highly respectable family in the north of Ireland, had been originally a Catholic, but understood not a syllable of Irish. An expression so puzzled, disastrous, and comical, from that very cause, settled upon his features, that the whole company, many of whom understood me thoroughly, were in convulsions.

"Oh!" said the Doctor, "I beg your pardon, young man, you are a linguist, I perceive."

"Yes, sir," I replied boldly, "I am a linguist, and something besides, as you shall find."

"And, pray, what language is that in which you have just addressed me?"

"It is the vernacular, sir, of a certain country with whose history you are evidently unacquainted. Of a country, sir, whose inhabitants live upon a meal a month. Keep very little—for sound reasons between themselves and the elements; and where abstinence from food is the national diversion."

"God bless me," exclaimed the Parson, "that's very odd—very odd, indeed. I shall take a note of that. How very like Ireland! But the problem, my good lad, you have not solved my problem."

"I have, sir," I replied, "beautifully; but unfortunately you are not capable of understanding the language in which I did it."

"That is evident, my good boy; that is evident. Of course I am bound to believe you. I dare say you are not easily understood. You are very clever indeed. So you assure me that you have solved the problem?"

"Very elegantly, sir, indeed."

"Very good—very good. This is an extremely smart boy, Mr. Squander. None but a smart lad could have solved that problem; and indeed he did it—that is, if he did it at all—I beg your pardon, my lad—with a great deal of natural ease."

"If he is as good at every thing else as he is at natural ease," said the Squire, laughing, "he will come to something yet."

"Did you ever taste claret, my boy?" the Doctor then asked me.

"I am getting a specimen of it for the first time to-night, sir," I replied.

"Well, have a glass," he proceeded. "Master Richard, give him a glass of claret;" which Richard immediately did. "Claret, my lad, is a most delicious beverage after dinner; its exhilaration, though delightful, is gradual. Now I prefer claret, my lad, to any other liquor. It does not excite the passions, be at it as it did I would not drink it—but it awakens all the virtues—it—it only plays round the head, but then it reaches the heart, and refines all our sentiments; it kindles up religion, and a love of our kind, and in in—fac—fact it promotes harmless convivial converse and uni—univer—versal harmony."

"Claret, sir," I exclaimed, after having finished the glass—"here take it away, Master Dick the glass I mean; why, sir, no man that hadn't a heart of ice and the blood of a frog in him, would drink such stuff as that, Doctor! No, sir; but if you wish to awaken, and look about you in the world, and not to pass through life in a dream; if you wish to have a warm heart, clear head, a good appetite, and an honest conscience, take to the true poteen. Doctor, you will never be a man if you don't—nor know until after you are dead whether ever you were alive or not. That's a fact, of which, thanks to claret, you are not at present conscious. The truth is, Doctor, you are dead—dead as the sea, and devil a thing but the true Pierian will ever bring you to. —make you open, and rub your eyes—stare about you, and ask where did you come from? and if you have a good memory, at the time, he'll tell you the truth, and say—from the cold and lifeless land of claret. Then you will find yourself alive to some purpose. There, too, are the pretty girls—you will become brisk, lively, and averse to solitude, and fond of a plural life: you will feel your heart warm; a sanctified gallantry will possess your flesh will come upon you; you will get calves to your legs, which you never had before, you will long and it there was ever a petticoat in your way you would tumble it, and—by the powers! then, sir, you will be a respectable member of society, with a wife and family (a slight groan here proceeded from the Doctor). Then you will have a hearth of your own, the agreeable noise of your children about you (another groan), and you will be a very different man from what you are, which is full cousin to a nonentity or like a drawn cork from one of your own bottles, light and useless, but smelling strongly of claret. Poteen, sir, will raise the cockles of your heart, and set it a-dancing like an Irishman at a wedding. It will make your very nose curl with kindness towards all your fellow creatures. You will hear nothing but music and harmony whenever you turn The trees and rivers will sing 'Jig Polthoque,' 'Kiss my Lady,' and 'the Priest in his Boots,' as you go along. No day will ever be dark to you, no night sorrowful. On the contrary, the sun will look down on you with a grin of good humour, and say, 'that's a man, Doctor!' and the moon will look as loving and complacent as your own sweet heart (a start of something like horror from the Doctor); it will change you from a drone into a trumpet, and in the pulpit you will lull your congregation no more. Now, all this will happen, if you only abandon claret, that makes you both dreary and weary to yourself and others; and take at once to the unbaptised poteen. That's the drink, Doctor, that will make you love not only your neighbour, but his whole family, especially if there's a pretty girl among them. Yes, sir, that's what poteen will do for you, if you will only look up the spirit of an Irishman, and make it your familiar drink."

I need scarcely describe the effect which this impudent lecture to the Doctor had upon the company. Indeed, the greater portion of it had been composed by my schoolmaster O'Shaughran; nor need I dwell upon the mirth and laughter it created: and if anything could add to it, it was the attitude in which the worthy Doctor seemed to pay attention to it. While I was speaking, he sat with his hands clasped before him, and his eyes fixed, as if wrapped in the deepest attention, reminding one of the appearance of some of his own congregation, when lulled by the influence of his sermons. When the mirth, however, had ceased, the Squire resumed the point in hand.

"But in the meantime, Doctor, won't you go on with the lad's examination?"

"Oh! I beg your pardon, Mr. Squander—pray excuse me—I beg you will excuse me. Many thanks, my good boy—many thanks for your kind advice, and the warm interest you feel in me: but, as touching the examination at present, I happen to have a small edition of Horace in my pocket. Will you be good enough to translate me this ode?"

"Me, sir!" I replied. "Do you want to insult me? Where, sir, is the crawling school boy who could not do that? No, sir, I'd scorn to translate such a piece of contemptible facility. Why, sir, you might as well ask me to read you a child's fable, in words of three letters. No, sir, but I'll sing it for you, sing it to the very air to which it was set during the life time of the author, and sang through the streets of Rome by Ranunculus."

I immediately commenced, and sang Jam satis terris, &c., &c., as we had been in the habit of doing under O'Shaughran, to the comical air of "Cock a bendie;" an air which one would almost imagine had been made for it, and which had the company once more in convulsions.

"That's very cleverly done," said the Doctor, "very cleverly done, indeed! a most extraordinary boy and so utterly free from everything like diffidence!"

"You may swear that, Doctor," said the squire. "Not a doubt of it: if you never uttered Gospel before, you have now."

I then volunteered to translate him a portion of Virgil, which having had by heart, as almost every schoolboy has, I translated into tolerably good English, until I came to the line—conticuere omnes, intentique ora tenebant, when I paused.

"Why don't you proceed, my good youth," said he, "it is very well done very well done indeed but why do you pause?"

"Because that's the celebrated sizar's line," I replied, "and I don't wish to profane it by a common translation."

"How is that, my good youth?" said he; "I don't understand you."

"Why, sir," I replied, "you are aware that Kerry is the most classical county in Ireland. Latin is the vernacular language of the schoolboys, wherever you go, you will hear them talking Latin to each other, and singing the odes of Horace as they sit behind the creels upon the horses, while drawing their turf. At every sizarship-examination in Trinity College, I need not tell you, sir, that nineteen out of every twenty of them come from that indoctrinated and classical county. Well, sir, it happened at a sizarship-examination, that the Kerry men were, as usual, twenty to one against their competitors, and when a certain sizar came to this identical question, and went to translate it, he left it comically at the examiner, and said 'conticuere omnes,' we are all county-Kerry men; which, of course, occasioned great mirth.* The same sizar was John Philpot Curran, who, though not a Kerry man, would have done credit to the county had he been so."

"Of course the celebrated poluphloisboio thalasses was not forgotten."

"Doctor," I observed, "that line is not properly understood."

"I think, however, my good youth, that I understand it."

"And how," said I, turning the tables on him, "do you translate poluphloisboio thalasses?"

"The many sounding ocean, my good lad."

"No such thing, sir," I replied; "the next time you translate polyphloisboio thalasses, say, as you ought to do, 'Pon the boy for the lasses,' and you will render both the line and yourself justice." I believe the very hair stood on the poor Doctor's head at this version, and the inference to be drawn from it.

"I admire the humour," he said, "but I beg to be exempted that you have no objection, my good lad from the insinuation. I trust I don't offend you, my good youth; but do, pray, exempt from the insinuation."

This closed this extraordinary examination, to the perfect satisfaction of the Squire, who laughed immoderately at my assurance, and said I must be a devilish clever chap to have such a stock of it at my years.

"Come home, to-morrow, Randy," said he, "and we shall put you into fresh flesh, we'll get you new suits of clothes, you young dog, and you can set at once to business."

I then left them, but was followed out by Master Dick, who made me pay another visit to the cellar; and here want of memory draws a veil over the further occurrences of the night.

I have often reflected since upon the character and position of the good and charitable Doctor. Here was a man of the greatest worth—a man whose life was a series of virtues—practised with all the single spark of estimation or vanity of the most unaffected piety, and of apostolic simplicity of manners. Where ever there were poverty, disease, contagion, or death, there he was, in the twofold character of Christian minister and philanthropist, —characters that meet, alas! too rarely in the same individual. There he was, to soothe the anguish of the spirit; to sustain it by hope and consolation, and to relieve the pressure of destitution and poverty wherever relief was necessary. This man, so good, so pious, so humane, and so learned, did, nevertheless, in consequence of that one weakness, suffer himself to become a butt for coarse ridicule, and a target for the senseless jests of the profane and profligate of men, who, along with his only failing, possessed almost every vice of life, and not one of his virtues. Such a person should have married a wife, and entrenched himself within the affections of domestic life. These new relations, and the delightful sympathies arising from the love of his children, would have given him a higher sense of the condition of man, and of the energies necessary to maintain his position with dignity to himself and usefulness to society.

The next morning, according to appointment, I repaired to Castle Squander, and, finding the hall door open, which, indeed, was generally the case, I deliberately entered the dining room, and, certainly, a curious sight presented itself to me there. In no taproom in the most profligate slums of a metropolis could one find such an instance of drunken debauchery. About eight or ten persons were lying asleep, some on the carpet, some with their heads on the table; one fellow, the coroner, lay with his head inside a coal scuttle; another, one of the fox-hunters, had his head upon the coroner's cushion, with one of his spurs against Master Dick's leg, and it was evident that his imagination was leading him another chase, for he gave the view-hallo from time to time, plying the spur, as he did it, against the leg in question, with such vigour that young Squander, whom nothing short of a red-hot poker could have awakened, cursed him, in a drowsy, half smothered voice, between a snore and a groan, but, at the same time, in terms sufficiently distinct to enable anyone to understand, without difficulty, the geography of the country to which he consigned him. Bottles, glasses, and decanters were there—some shivered, and others with their contents overturned; some of the sleepers had got sick about the stomach during the night, and it is unnecessary to say that the whole scene, presented anything but the beau ideal of civilised life.

I left the room without reluctance, as the reader may guess, and proceeding to make inquiries in the kitchen, had there a fresh opportunity of witnessing debauch upon a more mitigated scale. The servants, both male and female, with certainly some exceptions, had not neglected to help themselves with whatever liquor was left by the guests who had fallen asleep. This they looked upon as a regular perquisite, but, as they could not afford to take their rest in the morning, having in charge the domestic business of the family, the consequence was that two thirds of them scarcely knew what they did or said. A fat man cook, with bandy legs, his white apron tied about him so tight that it was sunk and dragged into his flesh, which piece of taste, when taken into conjunction with a striped cotton jerkin, that ran to a point behind, gave him a most ludicrous appearance; this fat man-cook, I say, was in high and wordy argument with an ass-stant of the other sex, who was still fatter. The cause of the quarrel appeared to be a fit of jealousy, brought on by drink, against the latter assistant and one of the stable boys, who, he insisted, had kissed her upon the lobby.

"It's a lie," she replied; "he did not ki-s me on the lobby, he kissed me on the lips, where he ought to kiss me; and now, you dropsical old saus-r. I dare you!" she added, fearfully brandishing her ladle over his head. The fat cook quailed: for it seems she was a perfect virago, and maintained a dreadful ascendancy in the kitchen; but he satisfied himself by bestowing on her several fierce and furious glances, that seemed to speak of some deep and terrible purpose that rankled within his injured spirit, and intimated a day of future retribution. Whether this purpose was levelled against herself or the stable-boy, however, the Pythoness on her Tripod could not determine. He left the kitchen, accompanied by a helpless and superannuated bull-dog, as fat and bandy as himself, and who seemed to be in the habit of supporting him against his opponent; for, on going out along with him, he gave a wheezing growl, and showed his red gums at the she-cook, as a proof that he entered into the quarrel of her antagonist.

"Ha!" she exclaimed, "I defy you both." And up went the huge mangel-wurzel arms, and round, once more, came the fearful ladle with a sweep of conscious power and indignation.

It was enough; the bandy old bull dog dropped his tail, gave a piteous whine, in apprehension of the expected blow, then, imitating his fat friend, accelerated his pace, and both waddled, with a cowardly scamper, out of the kitchen.

That kitchen, indeed, exhibited a strange scene. All appeared to be wealth, waste, riot, and extravagance, to watch we may add, licentiousness and riot. This was especially the case when never an entertainment was given at Castle Squander; for on these occasions the spirit of intemperance and debauch spread like an epidemic through the whole family—Mrs. Squander and their only daughter, Emily, excepted. Had I been old enough to reflect upon what I saw at the time, I might have drawn a deep and melancholy moral from it.

Under one of the kitchen tables lay two greasy scullions asleep, one lying over the other like a St Andrew's Cross. The butler and one of the footmen, it appeared, had fought that morning—nobody could tell why; and, when I entered the kitchen. the former was lying asleep against a table, with his head resting on a greasy napkin, his white apron tucked up, and a bandage round his eye. The footman, more than half drunk, was coquetting with one of the chambermaids, whom he forced out to dance, whilst he himself whistled the music; and every now and then he looked triumphantly towards the butler, shook his fist at him, and then pointed triumphantly to his bandaged eye. Viands of the greatest profusion and delicacy were strewed in many places upon the floor, and bowls filled with wine were trodden about like dirt. Tankards of beer drawn in a spirit of the most wanton waste and abundance, were lying in every direction the beer stale and no longer fit for use. All the evidences of neglect and carelessness were there. Casks of butter were trowelled about like mortar; and bread, in blue moulded fragments, might be seen lying in basketsful.

Whilst I was observing these things, the housekeeper came in a young woman of about thirty, rather genteel-looking and well made, but with a complexion a great deal too fiery for one of her age. I understood afterwards that she had been anxious to look this extravagance; but what could one do against so many? And besides, in the course of a few months it was discovered that she and the house-steward became rather intimate a discovery which rendered it necessary for her to give way, in order to secure their connivance—a principle which operated with equal force upon the steward himself.

After she entered, the huntsman came in—a shrewd, lank, tough old fellow, with parched cheeks and a weather beaten countenance—and ask for a bottle of whiskey, in order to treat the whipper-in and grooms, together with two or three country friends that were out in the stable loft. This was immediately given to him, but, as his hand was in, instead of one bottle he took two, and went away to do the honours for his friends.

On leaving the kitchen he thrust out his tongue at the housekeeper, when her back was turned, and gave me a wink to follow him, which I did. Whilst passing through the yard I could observe the same evidences of carelessness and neglect in everything about me. But it was almost impossible to hear a single word he said, in consequence of the howling, barking, and yelping of two packs of hounds one of harriers, another of fox-hounds with pointers, setters, cockers, water spaniels, and retrievers, ad infinitum. He pointed out to me a kennel kitchen, with an immense boiler, in which food was prepared for all these animals; and it was, too, of the best description. In one end of it stood a dozen sacks of oatmeal, a large bin of potatoes, and a pump for procuring water.

Now it so happened that the year in question was one of severe famine, and I could not help reflecting, even then, that the sum of five pounds, subscribed to the relief fund by Mr. Squander, took a very inhuman shape when associated with the profuse abundance thus lavished in his kennel, whilst so many of his fellow-creatures—many of his own tenants—were literally perishing for want of food.

On further inquiry, I found that the Squire himself would not make his appearance until about two o'clock, which, after an entertainment, was the usual hour of breakfast. I accordingly returned home, resolved to wait until I could find the family in a proper condition to talk to me upon the subject of my tuition.

At three o'clock I saw the Squire and Master Dick.

"Well, Randy, my boy," said the former; "are you ready to come home?"

"Quite ready, sir; if you have no objection," I replied.

"Well, then," said he, "you shall have thirty pounds a year and your board. You will dine with the steward, and, if you go into Squanderstown, and call upon Shea, the shopkeeper, he will give you a couple of suits of clothes, and tell him to place them to my account; or stay, he may hesitate, without a written order, and my hand is in such a confounded tremor that I can't write. Dick, do you go with him, and that will do as well."

"Certainly, sir," replied Dick, "I will, with pleasure. Didn't he work up M'Claret beautifully last night?"

"He did," replied the father, laughing. "Randy, my lad, you must be a devilish clever chap, and I have no doubt but you will get these whelps of mine to make a progress; if you do, though, it's more than any one could ever do before you. Off with you now, and put yourself in decent trim. Do you, Dick, go with him."

"Glad, sir," said Dick, "I can go nowhere till I get a glass of brandy to settle my nerves."

"Get it, then, and be off; you and your brothers are losing your time."

Another visit to the cellar, which, I found, subsequently, was Master Dick's favourite haunt, set both himself and your humble servant pretty well on our props: he was a brandy man, but I stuck, like truth, to the true Pierian. I shall not enter into detail as to the bargains we made with the mercer; it is enough to say, that the worthy man, to whom a large bill was already due, charged us double price for everything we purchased. The cloth was sent to their family tailor, who took my measure, and promised to have them ready in a few days. It is sufficient to say that, within a week, I was located as an inmate of Castle Squander in the responsible capacity of private tutor and director to the young gentlemen—an equally strong proof of Mr. Squander's judgment and my qualifications.

THE NEEDLE'S EXCELLENCY.

JOHN TAYLOR wrote a book called, "The Needle's Excellency," in which are some poems addressed to the stitching ladies of quality. It appears that there were several sorts of stitching, now obsolete; for instance, there was

"Tent-work, raised-work, laid work, frost-work, net-work,
Most curious pearls, or rare Italian cut-work
Fine fern-stitch, finny-stitch, new-stitch, and chain stitch,
Bravebred-stitch, fisher-stitch, Irish-stitch, and Queen-stitch,
The Spanish-stitch, Rosemary-stitch, and maw-stitch,
The smarting-whip-stitch, back-stitch, and the cross-stitch."

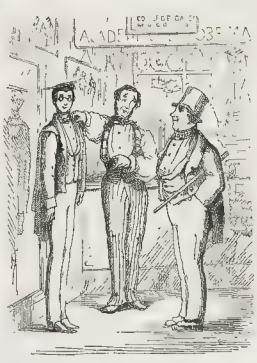
The book is scarce, and the above extract is found in Sir E. Brydges's "Restituta."

* By pronouncing the word conticuere in a certain manner, it certainly sounds very much like county Kerry. It is told of Curran, but I will not guarantee its authenticity, and has been remembered as a good piece of wit ever since.

THE ADVENTURES OF MR. VERDANT GREEN, AN OXFORD FRESHMAN.—BY CUTHBERT BEDE, B.A.—PART II.

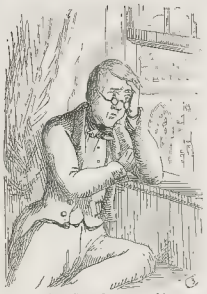
13.—Mr Green, Sen., having put himself under the direction of a Guide, visits the exterior of Christ Church, "Built by Cardinal Hookey, four undred feet long, and the famous TomTower, which tolls one undred an wun hevery night."

14.—And having, under the guidance of the same gentleman, done "the Alls, Colidges, and principal bedifices in a day or an a aff," Mr Green takes back to Warwickshire a slightly confused impression of Oxford.

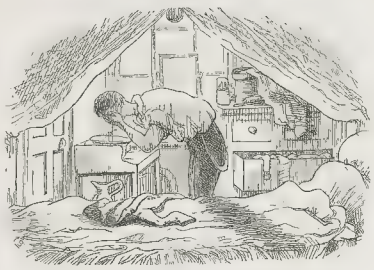


15 Mr Green being anxious to see his Son in his cap and gown they proceed to an academical robe maker's, and are mutually gratified with the result;

16.—And leaves Oxford, after an impressive scene with his Son, whom he embraces in the manner of the heavy fathers of the stage.



17.—Mr. Verdant Green returns to his rooms at St Bonifice's College. He feels rather lonely, and wishes the Germans band in the street would play any other tune than "Home, sweet Home."



18. Mr. Verdant Green finds his bed room inconveniently sma...

19.—Mr. Verdant Green sits down to breakfast, and feels great awe of his scout, who audibly tells him know the meaning of "perquisites." "Put away them tea things, sir," "Take off them knives and forks, sir," "Do clean them boots, sir." Mr Verdant Green murmurs the words "ignorance," "cast-iron," "university," and tries to look as if he wasn't blushing.

20.—But manages to dress in time for Chapel, where the markers of the chapel-list take mental daguerreotypes of his personal appearance

21.—In Chapel Mr Green is much surprised at his neighbour getting up his lecture, instead of reading the lesson, and is disgusted at the use made of his surplice.

22.—To divert his thoughts, he goes out for a stroll, and purchases a light cane to add to his appearance.

23.—Thus equipped, and impressed with the idea that his cap and gown are exceedingly becoming, he promenades in the Christ Church meadows, to the infinite amusement of several young ladies,

24.—And great alarm of many Ladies. Mr Verdant Green retires to rest with the feeling that he has made a sensation.

25.—Mr. Verdant Green finds Mr Larkyns and his friend, M. Smalls of Brazenface-in-a late breakfast, composed chiefly of tobacco and liquors. As Mr Green has not yet laid aside gown, but, like Hamlet's uncle, "wears his beaver," Mr Larkyns at first doubts his own identity, but upon being assured that Mr Green is not a dun confesses to be the individual to whom the letter of introduction is addressed.

WHY FRANCE IS DANGEROUS TO HERSELF AND TO HER NEIGHBOURS.

WHY is it that since the memorable year of 1789 France has been in a continual state of turmoil and uneasiness, a burthen to herself, and a peril to her neighbours? How is it that the warlike spirit of her people is continually fed? and that, unlike other nations of Europe, in this industrial and mechanical age, she finds a constant excitement in the aspiration of military dominion, hostile alike to her own improvement and to the well-being of all other states that are not separated from her either by the Atlantic Ocean or by the whole breadth of a continent? These inquiries are not barren ones. They are of the utmost importance to all Europe, and at the present time, when her destinies are, we will not say confided to, but lodged in, the hands of a reckless and obstinate tyrant, they are of more than ordinary interest to the whole world.

Many causes have indubitably conspired to make France what she is. Her people are impulsive, more than reasonable. They are not contented to amend proved evils by slow, although it may be by sure, processes; but, with an impatience which they share with all the cognate Celtic races, they destroy when it should be their business to renovate. In 1789, and the remarkable years which followed, France, suffering under the abominable nuisances of her ancient feudal system, and under the fearful evils entailed upon her by the military extravagance and domestic misrule of Louis XIV., the "glory" and curse of his country, and by the corruption of morals and government which prevailed during the Regency, and the long and unhappy reign of Louis XV., was reduced to an extremity in which revolution was inevitable. Everything gave way before the tempest. Nothing whatever was left; not a shred of the old institutions survived; and, in their impatience of evils which had reached a point at which they were intolerable, the men of that era made a clean sweep of all before them. They left not a stone standing of the ancient edifice of their Government, and effected not simply a political but a social revolution. Of the extent of that revolution, as it affected the whole life and character of the people, these early reformers, if such they may be called, were not themselves aware, for it required time to show the immensity of the change which they had operated. Whether it were for good or for evil, they could not tell. Their business seemed to be to destroy and they did it effectually. In the work of re-construction events have since shown that they made a lamentable failure. What they could not do, none of the statesmen who have since arisen in France have been able to accomplish. Attempt has succeeded attempt, during the last sixty years, to found a political and social system in that country; and in the year 1852 the French are as far removed from stability as they were in 1793. Those unhappy Frenchmen love liberty, but they do not comprehend it. They hate authority, and rebel against it; but they invite a tyranny, and bend their necks to its yoke and their backs to its whip as if they were determined in certain circumstances to be even more submissive than beasts of burden. Their military notions make tyrants of them at one time, and slaves at another. They are indoctrinated with warlike ideas. The only institution in France which has survived revolutions, and prospered upon them, is the army. The French understand the authority of the sword. Because one of the most pestilential tyrants that was ever permitted to desolate the world was a great winner of battles, they deify the scourge, and place their confidence in an untried man, merely because he bears the same name as the departed conqueror, and because they have a vague notion that power and greatness are somehow or other associated with it. This military feeling is, we believe, produced by the operation of other causes than those of national pride and vanity. We believe that a deep-rooted social misery lies at the bottom of it; and that it is to the unhappy state of the laws, which do not so much regulate as compel the division of property, that the world must attribute the constant discontent of the people of France with every form of government which has been tried in that country for the last two generations. This discontent is ignorant of a remedy, and seeks it at one time in the native overthrow of a Monarchy, at another in passive acquiescence with the newest system that may be forced upon the country, and at all times in a desire to try the chances of foreign wars, especially of such wars as promise an extension of territory.

In the Number of this Journal issued on the 8th September, 1849, we drew the attention of our readers to this subject, and showed, by the reports of the inspectors appointed by King Louis Philippe, that the compulsory subdivision of estates in France produced the insolvency and pauperism of the agricultural classes. In abolishing the law of primogeniture and the old feudal system, the founders of French liberty—that word and thing so grossly misunderstood—instituted a new tyranny. They compelled the subdivision of the soil. A man with a large or small farm, as the case might be, was forced by the new law to divide his lands equally among all his children. The result was inevitable—division and subdivision, until farms became too small for profitable cultivation, and until pasturage became in many cases impossible. There were in France at the time the inquiry was instituted by Louis Philippe no less than 10,534,794 landed proprietors, holding for the most part little plots of ground which they cultivated with the spade. Of this number only 6681 derived an income of more than £400 per annum from their lands, while there were 369,603 estates of the annual value of only £12; 737,136 of the value of £8; 873,997 of the value of £4; and 2,600,000 of an annual value not exceeding £2. The great bulk of these proprietors, as stated in the official reports alluded to, were strangers to a meat diet, and "stood alone," as the inspectors forcibly remarked, "in unassisted misery—in ill humour with everything, and especially with all that were higher or happier than themselves." The breeding of cattle diminished in every part of France; and in 1840 an act was passed, on the remonstrance of the butchers of the capital, legalising the public sale of horse-flesh as an article of diet.

Since the time at which we wrote, some very striking facts in support of the views we then expressed have been brought to light, and published by the statists of France, official and non-official. We owe to the industry of a writer in the last number of the Westminster Review an able resumé of the subject, from which we shall cite a few of the most remarkable facts. They will show how dangerous it is for France and for Europe that such misery should exist. In a report made to the late Legislative Assembly by M. Chégaray, on the 29th of April, 1851, that gentleman stated, on behalf of himself and of his colleagues appointed to inquire into the subject, that the landed proprietors of France were nearly all in a state of hopeless bankruptcy. The commission, founding their calculation on the net produce of the direct land-tax, which they considered to be one-twelfth of the whole rental, and which was ascertained by the public records to be 160,000,000 francs, estimated the net annual revenues derived from real estates in France to amount to 1,920,000,000 francs, or £76,800,000 sterling. The amount of mortgage debt upon this estate was published by the French Government for the years 1820, 1832, and 1840. On the 1st of July, 1820, the mortgages on this annual revenue of £76,800,000 amounted to 8,863,000,000 francs, or £354,520,000. On the 1st of July, twelve years afterwards, the mortgages had increased to 11,233,000,000 francs, or £449,320,000; and on the 1st of July, 1840, to 12,544,000,000 francs, or £501,760,000. If the same rate of increase as that which prevailed from 1832 to 1840 has continued up to the present time, the mortgage debts would amount in 1852 to the sum of 14,510,000,000 francs, or £580,400,000. In the year 1845, the Government of Louis Philippe, being anxious to ascertain what interest was paid by the embarrassed proprietors of real estate, requested information of the various "conseils généraux" throughout France. The result was, that "of sixty-one general councils fifty-seven declared that landed proprietors always paid more than 5 per cent. on mortgage debts. Seventeen estimated at 6 or 7 per cent., costs included, the rate of interest habitually paid; twelve estimated it at from 7 to 10 per cent.; while some spoke of 12, 15, 20, and even 22 per cent., when the mortgages were of small amount."

With these figures we gain some insight into the unhappy condition of the most numerous class in France, the class that pro ides soldiers, the class that votes for Louis Napoleon, the class that is dissatisfied with the existing state of things, and clings to any hope, however wild and forlorn, for a remedy; the class that could not be worse off in war, but that expects it would be better. We borrow the following additional particulars from the article in the Westminster Review, from which we have already quoted:—

The real estate account of France may be stated as follows:—

		Francs.	Francs
Net revenue			1,920,000,000
Deduct—
Direct land-tax	..	160,000,000
Additional centimes ..	..	80,000,000
Interest on mortgage debt ..		1,015,700 000
			1,255,700 000
Balance left proprietors			664,300,000

But, fearful as these figures are, they do not tell the whole truth. M. Blanqui, of the Institute, not the Red Republican, but the statist and philosopher, says, "that many of the so-called proprietors of the French soil are in want of everything—of clothing to cover them, of food to nourish them. An immense proportion of the taxes is imposed on miserable huts, whose occupants are too poor to repair the thatched roof which lets in the rain and cold to the family." In an official return to the Government it is stated that in France there are 348,401 dwellings with no aperture but the door; 1,817,328 with only one window; and 1,328,937 with only two windows. These miserable huts shelter in all a population of no less than 16 000,000. But space fails us to pursue the subject to a greater length. We have, however, cited sufficient to show why the great bulk of the French are always dissatisfied, why any Government is so difficult to establish, and where at the same time the military spirit finds its pabulum. It is these miserable proprietors, most of them far worse off than the English agricultural labourer, and not having, like him, the last resource of the union workhouse to apply to in extremity, who swell the acclaim that hails Louis Napoleon and his tyranny. Ignorant and reckless, desiring to live, but not knowing how, they give their votes to the man who represents the only name and the only principle they can understand—the name of Napoleon, and the divine right of the sword. Louis Napoleon has all the upper and educated classes, and a great portion of the bourgeoisie of the towns, against him, but he relies upon the millions. With such millions, in such distress, and with such a ruler, France must continue to be dangerous to herself and to all the world.

Yet a very small amount of rational liberty would speedily produce a remedy. All that is wanted is the repeal of the law which compels the subdivision of property. Freedom in this respect would work wonders, and would do more good to France than all the other schemes of liberty she has ever been regaled with.

THE FORTRESS OF HAM.—EMBARKATION OF POLITICAL PRISONERS AT BREST, FOR CAYENNE

HAM is a small town on the Somme, surrounded by marshes, in French Flanders; and its citadel has acquired much notoriety as a state prison, more especially in the French revolutions of the last one-and-twenty years. The Engraving presents a bird's-eye view of the fortress, which was originally built in 1470 by the Comte St. Pol, afterwards beheaded by Louis XI.; and it bears over the gate his motto, "Mon Mieux." The citadel has been much strengthened by modern work, so as to be now a fortress of importance. The donjon tower is 100 feet high and 100 feet wide, and the walls are of nearly 36 feet thick. The Prince de Polignac and three other Ministers of Charles X., who signed the fatal ordonnances of July 25, 1830, were confined here; as was also Prince Louis Napoleon, and several of the political prisoners arrested during the recent coup d'état—among the latter Generals Changarnier and Lefló, and M. Baze, whose release was characterised by the following incidents. It appears that at the moment these distinguished prisoners arrived at Valenciennes to take the train for Belgium, a company with six police agents in the institution of their arrival had not yet reached the authorities of that town. One of the last-mentioned having recognised General Changarnier, who, as well as the others, was proceeding to the frontier, was hailed as an assumed name (it is said, by order of the Government), the Valenciennes police imagined that they were escaping from the fortress of Ham. They paid no attention to the explanations given by their confrères of Paris, who were regarded as accomplices of the prisoners; and thus, notwithstanding that they showed their papers and their authority for acting as they did, the commissary of police of Valenciennes arrested them all, and imprisoned them, as a measure of security. The mistake was not discovered for more than two hours, when the official notification of the Minister of the Interior was transmitted from the Sous Préfecture attesting the authorities of Valenciennes of the measure of expulsion against the prisoners of Ham, as also the confidential mission to the police agents, who were, as is usual in such cases, dressed in plain clothes, and who were, equally with those so treated by them, subjected to temporary captivity.

On the 6th inst. a private of the 6th Regiment of the Line, named Girardin, who claimed to be merit of having favoured the escape of Louis Napoleon from the fort of Ham, in 1846, was tried by court-martial in Paris, for desertion. On being reproached with having committed this crime with the attendant, the soldier replied warmly, "Oh, no, colonel; I am too much devoted to Prince Louis Napoleon Bonaparte to have entertained such an idea. It was I who, when the Prince was detained at the fort of Ham, had the adventure, which many others envied me, of favouring his escape. Colonel, I must tell you that I was on guard at that moment. The Prince passed before me disguised as a mason, bearing a plank on his shoulder. When I saw him approaching me, I very quickly perceived that his was not the step of a roufle, but that it was the Prince himself. I was much affected, and I turned on my left heel to leave a free passage for the mason carrying the plank. I was punished for not having kept a stricter watch by one month's imprisonment." However, the prisoner was found guilty, and sentenced to five years' imprisonment.

It will be recollected that great numbers of the political exiles have been sentenced to transportation to Cayenne, in French Guiana, and have, accordingly, been sent in batches to Brest, there to embark in vessels provided for their conveyance. The Illustration shows the scene of their embarkation, with a general view of the harbour of Brest, the chief naval seaport of France, and an arsenal of war and fortress of the first class, most advantageously situated on the French "Land's End." It has one of the finest harbours in the world, nearly landlocked, accessible only through a narrow and well-fortified throat.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

PARISIANA.

(From our own Correspondent.)

THURSDAY, Jan. 22, 1852.

After being closed for several months, the gallery of modern paintings at the Luxembourg has been, within the last few days, thrown open to the public. Thirty-nine new paintings have been purchased by Government and placed in the two northern galleries. In one of them a collection of the finest line engravings and the best lithographs has also been placed, and forms the complement of the museum. To display the new works advantageously, considerable alterations have been made in the arrangements; for instance, Horace Vernet's "Massacre of the Janissaries," which amateurs well recollect was for a long time at the Louvre, and which, after being removed to the entre place, held for two years by M. Couture's "Romains de la Decadence." The Government—whatever complaints may be brought against it—merits commendation for its dealings with artists, which are in the spirit of the most liberal patronage. The exhibition of the year 1851 of the really good pictures which attracted attention at the last year's exhibition in the Palais Royal have been purchased by the State. Among them are works by Isabey, Muller, Dansatz, Hellaingé, and a charming landscape of Madame Rosa Bonheur, the title of which, "Les Bergères," sufficiently indicates the subject. The selection gives pretty general satisfaction It is, however, to be regretted that MM. Diaz and Decamps should have been omitted from the list. For brilliancy and orig nality of colouring they are unrivalled, and their works would have replaced with advantage those of M. Ouvré and M. Gigoux. Several bronzes and statues have also been purchased for this museum; but, with the exception of M. Gatteaux's "Minerva," end a small marble statue by Tradier, their worth does not entitle them to mention.

All the treasures of art accumulated by the House of Orleans will soon be dispersed in various parts of Europe. The sale of the late King's private property commenced in the month of April last, when the melancholy remnants of the gallery of the Palais Royal were sold by auction. The objets d'ouvres which still remained bore painful evidence of popular vandalism. Some of Horace Vernet's first productions, his battles of "Valmy" "Jemmapes," and "Hanau and Montmirail," being ruthlessly mutilated by sword and bayonet thrusts. Several noble works were half burnt, having been snatched from the flames in the court-yard by some art-loving bystanders. Among them were some of the best works ever painted by Greuze. These, coupled with the long extent of naked walls formerly occupied by choice works of the great masters, excited an universal feeling of indignation as well as sadness among all present, who numbered many Englishmen well-known lovers of the arts. Now the collection of the magnificent tapestries manufactured at the Gobelins in the 16th and 17th centuries are all announced to be disposed of by public sale by order of the late Monarch's executors—ultimatis fedelitatis erit! Among these tapestries, which are at present on private view, are five of matchless beauty, designed by the celebrated Lebrun and the principal artistes of the age of Louis XIV., the Augustan age of France, representing the gallant feats of arms accomplished under the reign of the "Grand Monarque" the "Siege and Capture of Doesburgh," the "Capture of Besançon," the "Duc de Vivanne relieving the City of Messina," the "Capitulation of Ghent," and the "Surrender of Dôle in 1674." The freshness of colours in these extraordinary productions, now nearly two hundred years old, is something positively marvellous. There are other specimens, curious no less from their subjects than their inimitable execution. Among these we have Louis XIV., in the costume of a Roman Emperor, grasping thunderbolts in his right hand; the Duke of Burgundy as a Roman General; the Duchess de Berri in the costume of Flora; and another lady in the costume of Ceres "Fruges flava mater!" Two little fancy pieces are also deserving of mention—a Nymph and Satyr offering a Sacrifice to Venus," and "Venus and Adonis." It is hoped the Government will purchase at this sale all the tapestries representing the faits of the history of France, to preserve them to the country as monuments of its past glories. A few months since, the valuable collection of Sevres, Saxony, and Japan porcelain; all the bronzes, and other articles of virtu which ornamented the palaces of the King's domaine privé, were, in their turn, brought to the hammer, but were sold at merely nominal prices.

Duprez's new opera, "La Maladetta," is to be brought out at the Opera National, Boulevart du Temple. Mdlle. Duprez and, Paultier to sustain the principal parts.

FRANCE.

There is little calling for especial notice in the advices from Paris this week. The organic laws promised with the new Constitution, and expected to have made their appearance before this time, have not been promulgated; but without their aid it is not difficult to divine the character of the future administration of French affairs by Louis Napoleon.

The intention of the Prince President to render the complexion of his Government as autocratic as possible is made especially evident by the publication this week of one of the most plain-spoken documents that has ever emanated from an absolutist Minister—a circular from M. de Morny, the Minister of the Interior, to the Prefects of the Departments, on the subject of the election of the Legislative body.

It is a gem in its way. While it keeps up the farce of an unrestricted and unlimited franchise, it gives the most complete quietus to universal suffrage that can be conceived. We subjoin an extract:—

Monsieur le Préfet,—You will short y have to proceed to the election of the Legislative body. It is a great operation, which will be either a corollary or a contradiction of the vote of the 20th of December, according to the employment which you make of your legitimate influence. Bear well in mind that universal suffrage is a new and unknown element, easy for a glorious name to make the conquest of, unique in history, representing in the eyes of the populations authority and power, but very difficult to fix on secondary individualities; consequently, it is not by following former errors that you will succeed. I desire to inform you that the laws of the head of the State. You perceive that the Corps Législatif has ceased to exist, and the theatrical and dramatic part of the Assemblies, by interdicting the publication of the speeches delivered. In that way, the members of those Assemblies, not being occupied with the effect which their words in the tribune are to produce, will think more of carrying on seriously the affairs of their country. The Electoral Law will pronounce on the incompatibilities. The situation of public functionaries in a political assembly is always a very delicate matter, as in voting with the Government they lower their proper character, and in voting against it they weaken the principle of authority. The exclusion of functionaries, and the appointment of all indiscriminately, is most necessary here, in a country where fortunes are so divided as to be rare, the number of men who will be willing and able to fulfil such duties. Nevertheless, as the Government is firmly decided never to make use of corruption, direct or indirect, and to respect the conscience of every man, the best means of preserving to the Legislative Body the confidence of the population is to call to it men perfectly independent by their position and character. A man has made his fortune by labour, manufactures, or agriculture, if he has been occupied in improving the position of his workmen, if he has rendered himself popular by a noble use of his property, he is, perhaps, favourable to what is conventional; called a political man, for he will bring to the preparation of the laws a practical mind, and will second the Government in its work of politics on and re-edification. As soon as you shall have decided to run in the constituencies indicated above, the candidates who shall appear to you to have the most chance of obtaining a majority of votes, the Government will not hesitate to recommend to the choice of the electors. Hitherto it has been the custom in France to form electoral committees and meetings of delegates. That system was very useful when the vote took place au scrutin de liste. The scrutin de liste created such confusion, and such a necessity for coming to an understanding, that the action of a committee was indispensable; but now this kind of meetings would be attended with no advantage, since the election will only bear on one name; it would only have the inconvenience of creating pressure, bonds, and appearances of coalitions, which would only embarrass the people, and deprive them of all liberty. You will, therefore, dissuade the partisans of the Government from organising electoral committees.

It is intended that the senators, the councillors of state, and the members of the corps législatif, shall all wear regulation costumes, not only during their sittings, but on public occasions and at full-dress private parties. The dress of the senators will be very rich. It is of course to be in the style of the Empire. It is understood that the President's uncle, the ex-King Jerome, will be President of the Senate.

Saturday is fixed for the first State ball given by the President at the Tuileries.

All the banished ex-representatives have left France. M. Baze, who was one of the prisoners at Ham, and had been a Questor of the Assembly, has fixed his residence at Brussels, where, it is said, the King of the Belgians has, at the request of M. Thiers, conferred an employment on him, which, though producing no great emolument, will enable him to support his family, who were otherwise destitute of the means of subsistence.

The settings of the International Sanitary Conference were closed, on Monday, by the Ministers of Foreign Affairs and of Commerce. The Conference has left with the Ministers a convention and a body of sanitary regulations establishing as nearly as possible a uniformity in the system of the quarantines both in the sanitary laws and a imin strations of the Mediterranean.

There was a rumour on Tuesday, which obtained some circulation, in Paris, that an attempt had been made to assassinate Louis Napoleon; but the statement has not been confirmed

On Wednesday the anniversary of the death of Louis XVI. was, for the first time since 1830, observed officially by the suspension of all Ministerial and public receptions.

Several individuals of superior position in society in the departments have been arrested.

Amongst the decrees affecting the army which have been issued during the week we find the following measures decided upon; viz. Thirty-three Generals of Brigade, commanding divisions of military subdivisions in the departments; Colonel Charras, Captains Cholat and Millotte, expelled representatives, struck off the lists of the army; General Cavaignac's request to be placed on the retired list of the army granted by the Minister of War; the promotion, as a further tribute by the President of the Republic to the memory of Marshal Soult, of Col. E. Lheureux, the deceased Marshal's late aide-de-camp, to the rank of Commander of the Legion of Honour; and, finally, the decree of the Provisional Government of March, 1848, which reduced volunteer service from seven to two years, is repealed.

The Duchess d'Aumale was delivered of a prince at Naples on the 12th inst. He was baptized on the following day in the name of the Duke of Guise.

AUSTRIA.

In the Berlin papers of the 14th a letter from Vienna was published, which says:—

The President of the Council, Prince de Schwarzenberg, who has been indisposed for several days, has just had an attack of apoplexy, which may cause the most serious consequences. It is said that a despatch has been sent to Count d'Appony, Austrian Ambassador at Turin, offering the Ministry of Foreign Affairs to him."

Accounts, however, have been received in London direct from Vienna of the 16th, which make no mention of the alleged in.disposition of Prince Schwarzenberg.

The Earl of Westmoreland, Eng'ish Minister at Vienna, gave a grand soirée on the 12th, which was attended by all the corps diplomatique and the Princess Metternich. The Emperor gave a dinner and ball on the 14th, at both of which the Ambassador was present.

UNITED STATES.

The accounts from New York this week are to the 10th inst

The chief feature of the domestic intelligence is the reception by the Senate and House of Representatives at Washington of Kossuth. The account of the proceedings in the Senate is couched in the following telegraphic despatch:—

At one o'clock, on the 5th, Messrs. Shields, Seward, and Cass entered the Senate with Kossuth, who was leaning on the arm of Mr. Shields.

Mr. Shields said: Mr. President, we have the honour to announce Louis Kossuth to the Senate of the United States.

The Chair invited Kossuth to a seat placed in front of the Secretary's desk.

Senators then rose, and Kossuth advanced to the seat and sat down

Mr. Mangum said: In order that senators and all others may have an opportunity of paying their respects to our illustrious guest, I move that the Senate now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate adjourned.

A crowd then advanced, and were introduced to Kossuth by Messrs. Seward and Shields.

Kossuth did not address the Senate. The committee informed him that the Senate did not expect that he would deliver an oration, and he accordingly consented to remain silent.

Kossuth had an interview with the Secretary of the Interior on Saturday in alluded to his intervention project. The Secretary replied that his department was devoted exclusively to home affairs, and that all questions of foreign policy came through the State department.

Kossuth then declared that the opposition which he met at the hands of Congress and the Executive convinced him that his mission to this country had completely failed. He felt deeply disappointed at the reception he had met with in Washington—it was wholly unexpected.

He inquired, in case a body of Hungarians desired to settle in the United States, if they could get a tract of land? Mr Stuart remarked that Congress had the disposition of the public lands, but that he did not doubt a tract of land would be granted if desired. Kossuth corrected the Secretary, and explained that he did not want the land as a gift—they would pay for it; but only desired that it should be so located that the Hungarians could live together in a separate community

At the President's dinner on Saturday no speeches were made.

The House of Representatives had agreed that Kossuth should be introduced by a committee of five. The reception took place on the 7th. On the same day the banquet given by Congress to Kossuth took place at the National Hall. About 500 persons were present. The Hon. W. R. King, President of the Senate, presided, supported by Kossuth, and Speaker Boyd on his right, and the Hon. Daniel Webster on his left. Several distinguished individuals occupied seats near the chair. Kossuth spoke at much length in explaining to the company the position of affairs in Europe as connected with Hungary.

The interview of Kossuth with the President of the Republic was also of a character to disappoint greatly the high expectations which the Hungarian leader had formed of American support. He was introduced to the President by Mr. Webster. After a brief interchange of the history of his country's wrongs and struggles, he reminded the President that, although an exile, he was "the nation's guest." He took that opportunity of expressing, through the President, his gratitude to the nation for the welcome it had given him. He had been received everywhere, hitherto, with unbounded enthusiasm, informed Kossuth that the settled policy of the United States, in regard to its intercourse with foreign nations, was that of non-interference, and that his message to Congress on that subject was not merely addressed to them, but it was also a declaration to all the world of the policy to which he was bound to adhere.

"We learn from Washington," says the New York Herald, "that Kossuth does not deem it necessary for him to immediately return to Europe, now that he is convinced his mission to this country has proved a failure. Perhaps Louis Napoleon's coup d'état has assisted him in arriving at the conclusion. It is said that he now contemplates a visit to the West. After once seeing the fertile land in that region, it is not at all unlikely that he will be disposed to settle quietly down there, and pass the remainder of his days in agricultural pursuits, rendered illustrious by a seat as a member of Congress from one of the western states."

After a lengthy debate in the Senate, numerous petitions, praying for the recal of the United States Minister from France, in consequence of the recent proceedings of Louis Napoleon, were laid on the table by a majority of 21 to 14.

An official report by the late judges and other officers of the territory of Utah, respecting the religion, polygamy, and general immorality of the Mormons, has been laid before the President. Accompanying this report is a copious affidavit, signed by Mormondom, was a counter statement from Governor Brigham Young and his coadjutors. The latter party, of course, charge the judges and secretary with official misconduct, but do not establish the fact that the social condition of the Mormons is any better than represented by those officers.

From California the latest intelligence is dated the 5th of Dec. It contains very favourable accounts from the mines; great quantities of gold are extracted, and new and very rich deposits are discovered. Large quarts masses are saying well. The extraordinary discoveries of gold in Mariposa are confirmed. A Sacramento paper says that, within twenty four hours after the first great rush to the spot, a town a little distance removed was surveyed, mapped, subdivided into streets, squares, &c., and in forty eight hours afterwards it contained a number of stores, taverns, boarding-houses or hotels, gambling-houses with monte and billiard-tables, and all the usual establishments found in the inland mining towns. It can now be scarcely doubted that the entire district is one mass of auriferous formations. From all parts of the country the intelligence of the continued productions of the ordinary shallow placers was most encouraging. The whole amount of earth ready for washing, and which would be washed before spring (says the Pacquine), is 300,000 tons, equal to 22,000,000 dollars. The amount of gold that would be washed during the winter months. The Klamath mines were more productive than at any previous period. Experiments in quartz-mining were being carried out on an extensive scale. The Pacquine predicts that 60,000,000 dol ars will be shipped during the first six months of 1852.

The shipments of gold during the month of November, and from the 1st to the 5th of December, were 4,171,764 dollars. The total immigration from November 15 to December 3 was 2183 men, 248 women, and 118 children. The departures for the same period were 987 men, 84 women, and 43 children.

Several murders had been committed at the northern and southern mines. Vigilance committees have been organised in those districts. A new route had been discovered across the Sierra Nevada, which was said to be superior to any other. It is much less mountainous, and easier by fifty miles.

The Indian hostilities in the south of the state are becoming more extensive and threatening. Antonio Garra, the chief of the Agua Caliente Indians, recently declared war against the whites. He had about 4000 men under him, while the available force of the whites in San Diego county does not exceed one hundred men. Martial law was proclaimed at San Diego on the 26th December. Colonel Barbour, the Indian agent for the district, is much blamed for not having attended to his duties, and for not now being at his post.

From Mexico the accounts received state that an outbreak occurred in the capital on the 16th ult., arising out of the passing of the Tariff Reduction Bill. The excitement was directed against Generals Lopez, one of whose stores were destroyed. The insurgents under Caravajal had relinquished Ceralvo, and retreated into the American territory.

THE COLLINS AMERICAN MAIL STEAMERS.—The following paragraph relating to these fine steamers appeared in the New York Herald of the 6th January:—"The splendid Ocean Steamship The steam-ship Pacific, Captain Nye, Collins line, has made twenty-two passages across the Atlantic. Longest, 13 days 8 hours; shortest, 9 days 19 hours and 34 minutes—the latter no doubt the fastest passage, mean or true time, ever made. The average of all her passages is under eleven days. The steamers of the Collins line have done better this winter than ever before. Their passages lately have been astonishing. Crossing the Atlantic to the westward in the middle of the winter in less than eleven days, is wonderful. The company, however, find it a losing business. Their expenses are enormous, and the income from the Government and passengers too small to cover expenses and pay a fair profit. If the Government does not come forward at this time substantial aid, it will be abandoned. The Emperor of Russia has signified a desire to purchase these magnificent steam-ships to form a nucleus for a powerful steam navy. Cannot something be done, at once, to prevent them from falling into the hands of a foreign Government?" Nothing has transpired in Liverpool which at all confirms the rumour of the probable withdrawal of these splendid steam-ships.

CORONATION OF THE KINGS OF PRUSSIA.—The coronation will take place in May, and invitations have been sent to the Emperor of Russia and the King of Prussia and Saxony.

QUEEN PHILIPPA'S MONUMENT IN WESTMINSTER ABBEY.—Mr. Cottingham has recently placed in the hands of the Dean and Chapter several large fragments, including two entire canopies, of the alabaster work which formed part of the original tomb. It appears these were purchased of the late Mr. Gyves, the Abbey mason, by his father, many years ago, and ever since have been most carefully preserved. Among the fragments are many of the deficient pieces of the canopy to the effigy. Some of the foliated parts are more like cabbage than any thing else. The Government then acceded with those important processes, which real y only require cleanliness, care, and a little judgment, be appointed to examine the quality of the meat, not only when preserved, but when in a raw state, and previous to the purchase by the contractors, in or out of England; and it would be even more gratifying if Government was to undertake it, and cause those preserves to be done in the various victualing-yards, where abundance of room for large operations would offer, besides, ought to contain more than six pounds of meat, the same to be very slightly seasoned with bay salt, pepper, and aromatic herbs in powder, such as bay thyme and bay leaf, a small quantity of which would not be objectionable even for invalids. That no jelly be added to the meat, but that the meat, and the meat alone, shou d produce its own jelly; and that with the bones and trimming of the joints a good stock about 3 be made without vegetables, well reduced and skimmed, to form a very fine gravy for preparation during a sea voyage. That air-tight canisters should be filled with the same, bearing a special mark, and one of these allowed to every dozen of the others; this demi-glaze when diluted in water would make six pints of very good broth, with which any kind of soup could be made in a very short time, otherwise divide it into portions with the meat; ordinary gelatine of any kind, so very beneficial on a long sea voyage, may be added, or served up separately, as a fine dish, with the greatest facility, and used [illegible] In a second communication to the daily papers, M. Soyer gives the following suggestions as to the discovery, by the external appearance of the canisters, whether the contents are sound or not:—"First, if either the top or bottom of the canister be convex, forming in appearance the shape of a watch-glass, it may safely be thrown overboard without opening, as it is then in the worst state of decomposition, and capable of causing disease on board the ship. Secondly, when in a state of semi-decomposition, by pressing with the thumb on either end, the tin will return to its original form; while, on the contrary, if in a good state, the appearance will be concave, or else quite flat."

THE ARCTIC EXPEDITION.

Mr. Augustus Petermann has addressed a letter to the Athenæum, suggesting a new plan of search, the merits of which ought to be inquired into immediately by competent authorities. He remarks that Wellington and Behring's Straits are the two chief entrances from the American side into the Polar basin, have, owing to the proximity of the land and accumulation of ice, hitherto frustrated the most determined advances of the various expeditions in these directions, and adds, that there are only two other sea entrances into this Polar basin. These are between Greenland and Spitzbergen, and between Spitzbergen and Nova Zembla: the difficulties of the former are very great; but as to the latter he suggests that the wide opening between Spitzbergen and Nova Zembla is probably often free coast and could be navigated by vessels entering into the open, navigable Polar Sea, and perhaps the best route for research after Sir John Franklin. Mr. Petermann thinks that, if a vessel would watch the opportunity to effect a passage through the Waigatz Strait, keeping, if necessary, in the first open navigable "Polinya" of the Russians, but he is decided of opinion that such entrance into the North Polar Sea through the opening would be much more likely to succeed than entering the Arctic sea from Lancaster Sound in March, Baffin's Bay during the summer months; and also that the further navigation of the Siberian Sea may likewise be performed with much greater facility in winter than summer. Mr. Petermann supports this novel theory by a statement of the principles which regulate the distribution of the gaseous and fluid coverings of the earth, of the laws regarding currents in the Arctic Ocean, and of the physical laws relative to the distribution of temperature. Vogel and Angus selected the most favourable of the winter months for their memorable expeditions, and invariably found "wide immeasurable ocean" before them at a comparatively short distance from the land; and that, too, in the month of what is actually the coldest region on the face of the earth. And Mr. Petermann considers it would be a monstrous anomaly if, at some distance to the west, where the same compliment of heat prevails, a sheltered sea were found to exist to Behring's Strait, and not be found the same "wide immeasurable ocean." Barentz saw an open sea in winter to the north of Nova Zembla, in 1795; and he declared, just before he died, that, had he sailed more westerly, he was sure he would have been able to enter the open sea. A screw-steamer at the rate of five miles an hour would, under ordinary circumstances, reach the 80th parallel, midway between Spitzbergen and Nova Zembla (about 300 geographical miles), in seventeen days from Woolwich, which is as far as from Woolwich to Cape Farewell, the southern extremity of Greenland. From the same midway point between Spitzbergen and Nova Zembla to the Herald and Plover Islands, north of Behring's Straits, is as far as from Cape Farewell to Beechey Islands, at the entrance of Wellington Channel, or about 1600 miles. The two distances together, namely, from Woolwich to the 80th parallel, and thence to the Herald and Plover Islands, are not more than that of the voyage of a ship to New York, U.S. The opening between Spitzbergen and Nova Zembla is nine times wider than Behring's Straits. A period of from six to eight months would be quite sufficient for vessels arriving in the Polar Sea to the 80th parallel, just before or when the sun has made its appearance, might, if only once able to enter the Polar basin, easily traverse it to the opposite side before the power of the sun had set in motion the great ice-bearing current, and they would then have before them the whole summer in the fullest sunshine for carrying out the object of their enterprise, namely, the search for Sir John Franklin.

The plan has been submitted to Captain Beechey, who has expressed his approval of it; but the conviction that his own scheme, to penetrate from Behring's Straits northward, is the best, is so strong in his mind to permit him to abandon it for any other, though fully recognising the great importance of that one and most ably supported by Mr. Petermann, the well-known physical geographer, whose suggestion, it is to be hoped, will be thoroughly worked out by sending an efficient steam-vessel upon its proposed route between Spitzbergen and Nova Zembla, as the result cannot fail to set at rest a question of much geographical and scientific interest, no less than to lend most material aid to that highest object, the rescue of the expedition under Sir John Franklin.

From letters received from Lieutenant Pim, dated St. Petersburg, Dec. 31, we learn that the gallant officer had been granted an interview by the Emperor, who listened with great interest to the explanations of Mr. Pim relative to the search, and almost at once so moved with the earnest ensrestics of Lieutenant Pim, that his Imperia Majesty directed him to send in a written statement explanatory of his whole scheme.

Official reports of her Majesty's ship Desidalus' visit to her Majesty's ship Plover, in Behring's Straits, have been published, but convey no information in the small expedition. On the 9th of September the Plover came to anchor, but further to prepare for passing the winter. Stores, provisions, and clothing having been completed by the Desidalus up to December, 1850, and such officers and men replaced as were desirous of quitting the Arctic regions, leaving a sufficient complement of the Plover, under Commander Moore, 41, exclusive of the interpreters. The Desidalus left Port Clarence on the 1st of October, at which period there was no news of the Enterprise.

THE BURNING OF THE "AMAZON."

The official inquiry into the origin of the fire was resumed at Southampton on Saturday, when several of the persons saved in the boats were picked up by a second Dutch galliot, and names landing at Plymouth we announced in our late edition of last Saturday, were examined; but the accounts given by them were of an uncertain, and in some respects of a slightly contradictory, character, as to the cause and origin of the disaster. It was, for instance, the opinion of one witness that it originated in the fore store-room, wherethe oil and tallow were kept—that he saw the flames issuing from the door when he left the cabin—that the light about an hour before the fire broke out. On the other hand, the evidence of the storekeeper, Mr. Innes, William Angus the engineer, Roberts the boiler-maker, and others, goes to show that the stores were not seen ascending below the store-room, into which they made their way, and that they must have originated between the fore boiler and the bulkhead, whatever might have given rise to them. The discrepancy is, perhaps, more apparent than real, and it is due to all the witnesses to say that they have made their statements with great clearness considering the circumstances, and with every appearance of candour and truth.

With reference to the fate of the passengers and crew at all missing, it is consolatory to think that there are still grounds for hope. One boat which yet remains unaccounted for is described as having got safely away from the vessel. When the last party of survivors left there were two boats afloat, and it is even urged there, available, and one of them (the captain's gig) was being towered, in compliance with an order given by him to provide for his own safety and that of his officers.

William Angus, second engineer, in his testimony, gave a horrible description of one person standing near the helm—his face and side burned, and a large blister formed, which, bursting the skin, was falling away in rihands. A little boy was also burnt black, and the skin was falling from him in a similar manner.

Captain Warburton, brother of the accomplished author, Mr. Eliot Warburton, who was a passenger on board the Amazon, has obtained an order from the Admiralty for two steamers to go in search of the boats which are supposed to have escaped, and in which he hopes to find those who have been saved in the fire. The vessels thus dispatched from Plymouth are the Sprightly, Master-Commander Allen, and the Avon, Second Master-Commander Veitch; and their orders are to join the Hecate in searching for the missing boats of the Amazon, and to continue the search for a reasonable length of time. The Hecate, however, returned to Plymouth on Tuesday last without bringing any further intelligence of the missing boats, and she should be found, therefore, to proceed to despatch her again to assist the other vessels in the search, agreeably with the orders sent by Mr. Warburton. The Sprightly also returned on Wednesday, with a like result.

From Falmouth we learn that on Monday afternoon, at four p.m., a large piece of a wreck was washed on shore at Swanpool Beach, at the back of Pendennis. On examination there was no doubt entertained of its having been a part of the ill-fated Amazon. The length is about twenty feet, its breadth of five planks, stanchions of nine inches square, with ends for rabbiting. The whole piece of wreck is straight, as if it formed originally a part of her bulwarks or top of her paddle-box. The wood is charred.

We are happy to announce that subscriptions to alleviate, as far as money can, the suffering which this dreadful shipwreck has caused, are rapidly pouring in, and are likely to amount to a large sum. Sermons have been preached in the various places of worship in and around Southampton, in support of the charitable object in view, and the collections made on those occasions have been considerable. Altogether the subscriptions received do not exceed £2,000. About £10,000 will be required; and there is no doubt, from the manner in which money is still pour ng in, that that sum will be obtained.

It is strange that, notwithstanding the most active exertions of the Southampton Amazon Fund Committee, they experience the utmost difficulty in discovering the families and relatives of those persons who were lost in the Amazon. The Peninsular and Company's establishment do not even retain a list of the crew; and, even if they did, it would not furnish information of where the men resided when ashore. Although the loss of the Amazon has been diligently recorded and noticed in every newspaper throughout the kingdom for the last fortnight, persons most deeply interested in the event who live in the vicinity of Southampton are even low ignorant of the calamity. This appears almost incredible, but is nevertheless true. It was only on Monday that the committee learnt that there was a widow with nine orphan children, who had claims on them. living at Deer Leap, a few miles from Southampton, in the New Forest Thousands of the wives and children of poor seamen employed on or in and thousands who can, never enjoy the luxury of reading a newspaper. Means have been adopted to obtain information of the sufferers by the loss of the Amazon, by causing the Southampton postmen to acquaint all those poor persons living in their districts, whom they may suspect to have had relatives on board, to attend at the Mail Company's offices and give information, after which such information is handed over to the committee. It is believed that the committee will obtain complete information about the end of this week of the extent of the claims on their bounty. There is not the least doubt that there will be a hundred orphans to provide for.

It is stated that the Board of Trade intend to enter into an independent investigation of the circumstances under which the Amazon was lost.

RE-OPENING OF CHRIST CHURCH, SPITALFIELDS.—Christ Church, Spitalfields, the chef d'œuvre of Nicholas Hawksmoor, a pupil of Sir C. Wren, and one of the noblest examples existing in London of that ornate style of Italian architecture common at the end of the 17th century, was re-opened on Sunday, after undergoing extensive repairs and restorations. The funds for its original construction were supplied from the national treasury, in order to provide a place of worship for the French refugees who, after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, fled to England, and settled in Spitalfields. The original design, however, was never fully carried out until the recent restoration. Under the direction of the architects, Messrs. Young, the whole church has at length been thoroughly renovated, and the beauty of the primitive design has now, for the first time, become apparent. The Lord Bishop of London preached in the morning to a crowded congregation, from two text, John iv. 23—"The hour cometh, and now is, when the true worshippers shall worship the Father in spirit and in truth, for the Father seeketh such to worship him." The sermon in the evening was preached by the Bishop of Colchester; and, at the conclusion of both services, liberal collections were made. The organ of this church has been enlarged and improved by Messrs. Gray and Davison.

PERSECUTION UNDER EPISCOPAL INHIBITION.—Last Sunday, notwithstanding the inhibition which has been served on him during the past week by the Bishop of London, the Rev. G. E. Gladstone (incumbent of Long-acre Episcopal Chapel) officiated as usual at that place of worship. He read a very eccentric sermon for the Dorcas Society, from Colossians, chap. i., 10, but only indirectly alluded to the position in which he is placed. The inhibition is founded on a passage in a sermon preached on Dec. 7, in which he said, "Some of the bishops God forgive them are traitors;" and further remarked, "that he would say much more plainly to his face than behind his back, that the bishop of London was a scarcely responsible and culpable fool in the matter." These sentiments he has once distinctly refused to retract. Mr. Gladstone is first cousin to the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone, M.P., and has not long been the minister of the above chapel.

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY.—The Cambridge University Commission had a meeting on Tuesday at the official residence of the First Lord of the Treasury, in Downing-street. Present:—The Bishop of Chester, the Dean of Ely, Sir John Romilly, and the Rev. Professor Sedgwick, and the Rev. W. G. Humphry, secretary. The Cambridge University Commission had another meeting on Wednesday, at the official residence of the First Lord of the Treasury, in Downing-street. Present—the Bishop of Chester, the Dean of Ely, Sir John Romilly, the Rev. Professor Sedgwick, and the Rev. W. H. Bateson (secretary).

NEW CHURCH, COALBROOKDALE.

To meet the spiritual wants of the population of Coalbrookdale, numbering nearly 2000, and to make provision for their supply in connexion with the Church of England, an arrangement was made in the early part of 1851 with the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for the separation of this part of the parish of Madeley, and its constitution with a small portion of Dawley Farra, under 6 and 7 Vic., c. 37, into a distinct parish.

The manufacturing population of the locality will be deeply indebted to their liberal employer, Abraham Darby, Esq., of Stoke Court, in the county of Buckingham, one of the proprietors of the coloured ironworks in Coalbrookdale, for having come to them the benefit of their own parish church, with a resident clergyman, by a munificent endowment of the living with the sum of £2000 and a parsonage-house.

The design for the new Church, now in course of erection, has been furnished by Messrs. Reeves and Voysey, Guilford-street, London; and the builder is Mr. W. Rimby, Coalbrookdale.

The style of architecture is that which was usually adopted for ecclesiastical purposes in the country about the middle of the 14th century. The Church will consist of the nave, with aisles, chancel, and chancel aisle. The aisles will be divided from the nave by columns, and arches springing from them, from which will spring the arches to carry the roof. There will be a massive tower at the south-west corner of the building, with turret stairs. The tower will contain a peal of eight bells, from the foundry at Loughborough. (A donation to the Church on the occasion of laying the foundation-stone). The length of the Church, inclusive of the chancel, is 112 feet; the width, 48 feet; the height of the nave to the ridge, 37 feet; the height of the tower, 90 feet. The whole of the accommodation will be upon the ground-floor of the Church, which is calculated to seat about 550 persons.

The body of the walls will be of Dawley stone; the door and window mouldings and dressings, and the quoin stones, will be of dressed Benthall stone, both of which are procured in the neighbourhood. The roof will be open to the church, and is proposed to fill in the tracery of the spandrils with wood, and in the works which adjoin the aisle of the Church. It is also proposed to construct in iron the bench-ends, the communion-rails, and such other portions of the work as the material can be readily and tidily applied to.

The site selected for the Church, churchyard, &c., is a portion of the estate of the late Francis Darby, Esq., of the White House, Coalbrookdale—a amidst scenery that may vie with the most beautiful in the counties of Monmouth, Derby, or Devon. The Church will be in the midst of the manufactories of the rich, richly-wooded slope of one of the loftiest of which it will stand a conspicuous and pleasing object.

The foundation-stone was laid on December 11, by Matilda Frances, wife of Abraham Darby, Esq., assisted by the Venerable Archdeacon Waring, in the presence of a vast assembly.

The first incumbent is the Rev. Charles Marshall, M.A., late Minister of the Episcopal Chapel, Sydenham, Kent, and Rector of St. James, Duke's-place, London.

At a meeting held since the laying of the foundation-stone of the Church, it was agreed that a clock should be provided for the same, with illuminated dial and chimes, as a token of sympathy with the generosity of the patron in the endowment of the living.

FUNERAL SERVICE IN HONOUR OF MARSHAL SOULT.

THE Church of the Invalides at Paris has often been the scene of funeral ceremony in honour of the military chiefs of France; but, probably, few of these commemorations have reached in solemnity the funeral service in honour of Marshal Soult, which was celebrated on Tuesday week with extraordinary pomp.

The President of the Republic, battalions from every regiment of the army of Paris, commanded by the colonel and major, two battalions of Republican Guards and Gendarmerie Mobile, two companies of engineers, a battery of artillery, two squadrons of mounted Republican Guards, and a squadron of Lancers were drawn up round the Hotel to render military honours to the memory of the first Marshal of the Empire. The front of the building was hung in black, with the initials and armorial bearings of the Duke of Dalmatia in silver in the centre. In the nave of the church rose a magnificent catafalque, surrounded with faisces of tri-coloured flags, and glittering in the light of many tapers. The aisles were occupied by the friends and relations of the deceased; and the centre by the Marshals of France, the Generals, and superior officers of the army. The President of the Republic was represented by his principal aide-de-camp, General Roguet.

At half-past eleven o'clock, Jerome Bonaparte, ex-King of Westphalia, Governor of the Invalides, and Marshal of France, entered the church, when the religious ceremony commenced. The principal celebrant was the Chaplain in Ordinary of the Invalides. He was attended and assisted by a numerous body of the clergy of Paris. The commencement of the ceremony of high mass was announced to the troops stationed outside by salutes fired from the cannon along the bank of the Seine; and from that moment to the close of divine service, the drums, muffled in crape, kept up a long low roll, and the bands of the different corps accompanied it with a funeral dirge. As soon as the ceremony was over, the troops defiled in front of the Invalides, and then returned to their quarters.

FUNERAL SERVICE IN HONOUR OF MARSHAL SOULT, IN THE CHURCH OF THE INVALIDES, AT PARIS.

CHARLES MACKAY, LL.D.

IN a previous Number we presented our readers with a portrait and memoir of Sir Henry Bishop, in connexion with the series of the "Songs of England" now being published by the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, and the musical editorship of which has been entrusted to the gentleman in question. We have now the pleasure of offering a companion portrait and a companion memoir of Charles Mackay, LL.D, with whom Sir H. Bishop is associated, and to whom the important task has been assigned of replacing the old words, frequently found unintelligible, vulgar, or not decent, of the old songs, by lyrics of a more modern cast, closely adapted to the spirit of each melody, and distinguished by that purity of moral taste and elevated poetic sentiment which the previous works of Mr. Mackay so uniformly exhibited.

Charles Mackay is, indeed, a name well and widely known in English literature, and which has become of late years particularly famous in connexion with that strong, earnest school of social and semi-political poetry to which its owner has contributed many of the most stirring lyrics, which for the last few years have been so widely and loudly re-echoed by the more impulsive and progressive portion of the population. While the more important and more purely fanciful works of Mr. Mackay—such poems as the "Legends of the Isles" and "Egeria," each of them showing rare and delicate powers of imagination, and that strong yet sublimated kindliness of heart which is natural to him—are, perhaps, those of his works which principally call, and will continue to call, down the admiration of the thoughtful and critical reader, his strong and earnest lyrical expressions of fervid thought and onward impulse, as applied to our political and social condition, have been those portions of his works by which his name is most popularly known, and respectfully and affectionately recognised. Scattered throughout, his larger works, however, are to be found many lyric pieces quite unconnected with any other than mere fanciful subjects, but which are gems of quiet, earnest thought and happy pithiness of expression. To a gentleman, then, so known and so endowed, it is that the proprietors of this Journal have entrusted the literary management and poetic composition of the series of Illustrated Supplements in the course of issue upon the "Songs and Song Music of England."

CHARLES MACKAY, LL.D.—FROM A BUST BY PATRICK PARK.

Charles Mackay is of very ancient and honourable extraction. He counts amongst his paternal ancestors the great family of the Mackays of Strathnaver, in Sutherlandshire, a powerful branch of a powerful clan; and is descended by the mother's side from the Roses of Kilravock, near Inverness, the proprietors for many centuries of one of the finest and most interesting old feudal strongholds in the Highlands. Mr. Mackay was intended by his relative, General Mackay—also, by the way, a literary man—for a military career in India; but circumstances prevented the design, and the subject of this sketch was educated abroad, in Germany and Belgium. The poetic faculty soon made its appearance, and in 1836 Mr. Mackay, then, of course, quite a young man, published a volume of juvenile poems. The venture attracted the attention of one who was an excellent judge of books and men—John Black, late editor of the Morning Chronicle, and well known to a wide circle of friends and admirers as possessing an understanding seldom rivalled in its masculine power and stern acuteness, and a kindly heart ever open to the claims of young and unobtrusive merit. Mr. Black availed himself of Mr. Mackay's powers as a linguist, and he joined the Morning Chronicle, to which he contributed many stirring political ballads and jeux d'esprit, besides performing his duty in the foreign department of the paper. He was soon afterwards removed to the sub-editorial department, the hard and responsible duties of which he continued some years to fulfil. During this period his separate publications were numerous. In 1839 appeared the "Hope of the World," a poem of very great promise and no little performance, in heroic verse, accompanied by a collection of minor snatches, giving evidence of that mingled lyric sweetness and strength which was afterwards to be so finely developed. His next work was a prose one, "The Thames and its Tributaries," a pleasant, gossiping, literary, historic, and antiquarian account of our great river, written in that easy and fluent style so different from the pragmatical cram of a guide-book. The "Memoirs of Popular Delusions" followed in 1841. The work is well known as combining two requisites not always found together—minute historical research, and pleasant and easy reading. "Longbeard, Lord of London," a romance placed at an early period of our history, and which has recently been republished in one of the cheap railway series of standard works, was next given, in 1842, to the world. After this tale, Mr. Mackay flew back to poetry, for which he always seems to have felt the greatest predilection; and in 1846 there appeared a finely original and thoroughly fanciful poem, called "The Salamandrine; or, Love and Immortality." This was a remarkable book. It wakened echoes hushed since the times of Keats and Coleridge, and it impressed upon the reader what the vague beauties of the latter poet never did, a strong and abiding meaning, and in all its teachings and doctrines a certain pungent, stringent "reason why."

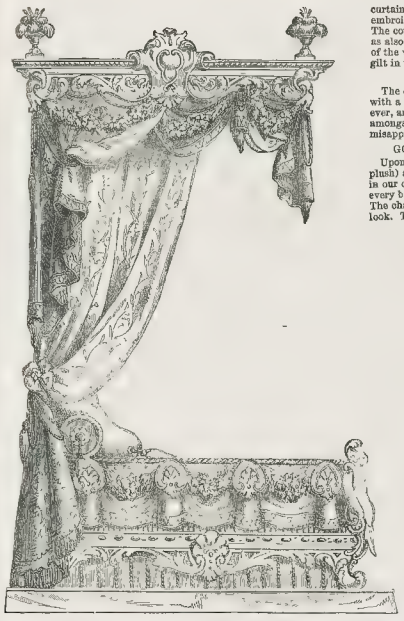
It was soon after the publication of this poem that Mr. Mackay proceeded to Glasgow, to undertake the management of a Liberal journal there. The Senatus Academicus of the University, delighted to hail a new citizen of high poetic reputation, and one who had ever used his intellectual powers so as to preserve the high gift pure and unblemished, unanimously conferred upon him the honour of a degree of LL.D. a distinction which was communicated in a most flattering letter from the late Professor Thompson, the celebrated mathematician. A residence in Glasgow naturally led to an acquaintance with the grand scenery of the Hebrides, and from this proceeded, in 1846, the "Legends of the Isles" a finely and picturesquely fanciful series of short poems, partly legendary, partly purely imaginary. But still Mr. Mackay's real sympathies were rather with the workers and the strivers of the day, than the ancient feudal lords and island priests asleep in Iona. When the Daily News was started, he contributed to it a succession of short but stirring and nervous poems, called "Voices from the Crowd." The sensation which they created was immediate and intense, and still exists. Need we remind our readers of what may now be called a national song, "There's a good time coming, boys?" or need we recal to their recollection the bright and hopeful philosophy, the earnest and the loving spirit, in which these little poems were conceived, or the pithy, nervous, and idiomatic language in which they were clothed? "Voices from the Crowd" has gone through four editions, and brought its author lasting fame, at once political and literary. Still, however, embodying the expression of the feelings excited by his Highland ramble, we come, in the year 1847, upon a volume of "Voices from the Mountains," a thoughtful and characteristic collection of poetry, containing memorials which may be one day of greater interest than at present, respecting his companions in a northern ramble—one of our most celebrated sculptors and one of our most energetic political thinkers and writers, now upon a public mission in India. A strong, nervous, and picturesque volume of "Town Lyrics" followed; the subjects in many cases of a nature which would be pronounced by Delia Cruscan critics as unfitted for poetic treatment—a shallow fallacy, which, however, has been nobly exploded by such men as Mackay, Barry Cornwall, Hood, and the Corn-law Rhymer.

Mr. Mackay's last great poem, and perhaps his best, "Egeria, or the Spirit of Nature," is a thoughtful and finely philosophic demonstration of the futility and emptiness of misanthropy, and the power of the Spirit of Nature, when earnestly appealed to and candidly and lovingly hearkened to, to dispel and scatter the cold despairing visions with which the soul of a reflective and earnest man is too often visited.

Mr. Mackay left Glasgow in 1847—the journal which he had conducted with unabating zeal and energy in the Liberal cause not long surviving the secession of its animating and directing spirit. Since the period in question he has been resident in London.

The above slight sketch may give some notion of the poetic and literary aptitude which pointed Mr. Mackay out as a fitting person to whom to confide the task of preparing a new version of the songs of England to the old music. An experienced judge, and with a refined and [illegible] in all which relates to [illegible] Mr. Mackay [illegible] many of his [illegible] songs. He possesses, indeed, in an [illegible] lyric aptitude. His muse is ever elevated and ever honest. He never loses himself in abstractions. His songs and poems come at once from and go at once to heart and brain; while sublimity, warmth, and cheering them there is that glowing kindliness of nature, and that strong passionate love for good men, good thoughts, and good deeds, which is of itself an inspiration and a gift.

THE GREAT EXHIBITION.



STATE BEDSTEAD.—BY FAUDEL AND PHILLIPS, NEWGATE-STREET.

Messrs. Faudel and Phillips exhibit a State Bedstead of needlework, produced principally from British materials, worked entirely by Englishwomen in London, including almost every description of ornamental needlework, the object of the exhibitors being to open a source of profitable employment, and to train a portion of our industrious female community. It is a gaudy affair, and by no means the sort of bed we should choose for a quiet nap. At the same time, its costliness and originality claim for it a somewhat detailed notice. On the footboard is a copy of Guido's "Aurora," in worked tent-stitch, with split wool. To produce many of the tints, split threads of various hues have been twisted together by the workers. This one piece contains upwards of 700 shades and 1,083,000 stitches. The tester, or head-piece, is worked in cross, Gobelin, and raised stitches with wool, silk twist, and chenille. The centre is copied from Thorwaldsen's "Night." It is suspended from a wreath of flowers selected from and emblematical of all nations, tied together by laurel, ivy, and myrtle, emblematic of peace. The fruits and breadstuffs of the world united are raised work, and copied from Raffaelle's ornaments in the Loggie of the Vatican, but grouped to be appropriate to the present subject. There are here, in all, fifty-four different flowers. The upper valances or hangings are entirely in silk chenille, manufactured in Spitalfields. But it was a great error in taste and judgment to attempt representing on a flat surface the folds of velvet draperies, supported by worked cords, &c. It is a deception which offends when it is found out. The ceiling, designed by M. Boiteux, represents angels watching over the sleepers, and holding wreaths of roses over them; this, as also the inner cornices, are in cross stitch. The curtains are worked on white watered Irish poplin, the design of the embroidery so arranged as not to show a join; they are 13 feet by 9 feet. The cover or counterpane is a junction, as it were, of all the parts: this, as also the curtains, have been designed by M. Boiteux, superintendent of the work department of the exhibitors. The bedstead is carved wood, gilt in the Louis Quatorze style.

CHANDELIER. BY JACKSON AND SONS.

The chandelier, intended for gas or candles, is a showy composition, with a good flow and variety of outline. The cupids and birds, however, are cruelly misplaced in such a production, and are instances, amongst many which the Great Exhibition afforded, of redundant and misapplied decoration.

GOTHIC CHAIR. BY HOFFMEISTER, SAXE-COBURG.

Upon this chair (the material of which is oak, covered with brown plush) a great deal of decorative fancy has been lavished; not, however, in our opinion, successfully. The incongruity of the devices must strike every beholder—griffins at our elbows, and ministering angels at our ears. The chair is certainly somewhat overdone, and has not a comfortable look. The carving, however, is very well executed

WINE TABLE OF IRISH BOG-YEW BY JONES, OF DUBLIN.

We have already, in our article on Wood-carving (Nov. 8), and in casual notices, made honourable mention of Mr. Jones's efforts to apply the Irish bog-yew to works of a highly decorative character; and, at the same time, whilst illustrating the history, antiquities, and animal and vegetable productions of Ireland, to give employment and encouragement to her native talent. The only fault we have found occasionally with his various exhibits was as to the too lavish introduction of objects and incidents. The result of this error (which is a symptom of beginnings in art, rather than of mature art) is to fatigue and perplex the eye, or to challenge criticism at every turn, and that for matters of detail, the highest merit of which should be found in their passing without offence, we may almost say without notice at all, &c. good or ill. "Least said soonest mended" is a sound maxim, and one which, considering art to be a sort of language, we would commend to all who resort to it for decorative purposes.

MEXICAN FIGURES. BY MONTANARI.

We have already spoken of M. Montanari's collection of Mexican Figures, and of Mdme. Montanari's wonderful Dolls, of which latter we presented our readers with a group. We now give a miniature representation of some two or three dozen of the Mexican Figures—productions copied with extreme accuracy of form and colour after local originals, and therefore extremely interesting as well as ornamental. We cannot help remarking, when contemplating these very accurate and amusing productions, and recollecting the equally remarkable models in the Indian department, that the power of imitation to an extent almost to be delusive is compatible with a total absence of all those higher principles which constitute the vitality of high art.

COURT AND HAUT TON.

THE COURT AT WINDSOR CASTLE.

The hospitalities of the Court have been enjoyed by a distinguished circle during the past week. On Friday last the second of a series of dramatic performances took place, when Mr. Planché's comedy of "Not a Bad Judge," and the farce of the "Lottery Ticket," were represented by the actors of the Lyceum and Haymarket Theatres, under the direction of Mr. Charles Kean. Among the company present to witness the performance were, his Serene Highness the Prince Leopold of Saxe-Coburg, his Serene Highness the Prince Nicholas of Nassau, Chevalier and Madame Bunsen, the Marquis and Marchioness of Normanby, the Marquis of Granby, the Earl and Countess of Derby, the Earl and Countess of Jersey and Lady Clementina Villiers, the Earl and Countess Granville, the Earl of Mulgrave, the Right Hon. Sir Charles and Lady Mary Wood, the Baron Hatzfeldt, the Baron Roggenbach, &c.

On Saturday his Excellency Count Walewski, the French Ambassador, had an audience of her Majesty, to which he was introduced by Earl Granville, her Majesty's principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. The Earl of Morley was in attendance on the Queen as Lord-in-Waiting.

On Tuesday her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, the Prince of Wales and the Princess Royal, the ladies and gentlemen of the Court, and the domestic household, attended Divine service in the private chapel of the Castle. The Hon. and Rev. G. Wellesley officiated. The Duke and Duchess de Nemours (who had arrived at the Castle on a visit to the Queen on the previous evening), and Prince Leopold of Saxe-Coburg, attended divine service in the Catholic Chapel at Clewer.

On Monday morning the Queen and the Duchess de Nemours walked in the Home Park and the Slopes. His Royal Highness Prince Albert went out hunting, accompanied by the Duc de Nemours, and attended by Col. F. H. Seymour.

On Tuesday Lord and Lady John Russell arrived at the Castle, on a visit to her Majesty. The Queen and Prince did not take their usual morning walk, owing to the unfavourable state of the weather; but her Majesty rode in the Riding-house in the forenoon.

On Wednesday his Grace the Duke of Wellington, and Sir Francis and Lady Arabella Baring, arrived at the Castle on a visit to the Queen. The Duchess of Sutherland, Viscount Canning, Sir James and Lady Graham, Lord and Lady Seymour, and the Hon. Hermione St. Maur, have also had the honour of sharing the Royal hospitality during the week.

Lord Byron and Lieut.-General Sir E. Bowater have succeeded the Earl of Morley and Captain Hon. J. Denman in their duties of Lord and Groom in Waiting to her Majesty.

Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent has been for some time past prevented from joining the Queen's parties at Windsor Castle by a slight attack of rheumatic pains. Her Royal Highness has given £50 to the destitute survivors of the Amazon.

The Duke of Wellington has subscribed £100 towards the funds for relieving the widows and orphans last destitute by the burning of the Amazon.

His Excellency the American Minister, and Mrs. Lawrence, Miss Lawrence, and Gen. T. B. Lawrence, left town on Monday morning for Paris, to be absent a few days. Mr. Bancroft Davis remains as Chargé d'Affaires of the United States during the absence of the Minister.

The attainment of his majority by Viscount Sandon was celebrated at Sandon on Friday, the 16th inst., by upwards of sixty of the tenantry and tradesmen of the Earl of Harrowby dining together. The church bells were rung at intervals during the day; and in the afternoon the foundation stone of the intended new hall, on the site of the old one, was laid by Viscount Sandon, in the presence of the Earl and Countess of Harrowby, and other members of the family.

Lord and Lady John Russell arrived in town on Wednesday, from Windsor Castle.

Mr. Fortescue, of Ravensdale Park, is to be created an Irish peer, by the title of Lord Clermont.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

The steeple-chase authorities have shown so little disposition to take advantage of the open weather, that we have nothing on paper for next week but coursing. The fixtures embrace Barrock (Cumberland), on Monday; Longford (Salop), on Tuesday; Southmolton (Devon), on Wednesday and Thursday; Ashdown Park open on Wednesday and three following days; Walton (Merpeth), on Thursday; and the Altcar Club, on Thursday and Friday.

TATTERSALL'S.

MONDAY.—The publication of the Chester Handicap, although it altered the position of some of the leading favourites, did very little towards improving business. Only the two favour lots were really backed. The Derby betting, on the contrary, was heavy. Alice Gray, Orlando, Kingston, Aldred the Great, and Pilot having strong parties, at improving prices:—

TESTIMONIAL OF RESPECT.—On Friday, the 9th instant, a deputation, consisting of about thirty of the tradesmen of Lymington, headed by the Mayor, and accompanied by James Brown, Esq., the town clerk, Captain Mackinnon, R.N., and some other gentlemen and members of the Town Council, proceeded to Efford House, for the purpose of presenting a splendid silver tea-and-coffee service to the Marchioness of Hastings, and Captain Yelverton, R.N., as a mark of respect on the occasion of their leaving their residence at Efford for Brighton.

THE DUKE OF REICHSTADT'S REMAINS.—Vienna correspondence of the 15th inst. states that the Emperor of Austria has consented to the request of the President of France for the removal of the Duke of Reichstadt's remains from Vienna to Paris. The body of the only son of the first Napoleon was deposited in the vaults of the Capucin Church, by command of the late Emperor Francis. This is the Imperial burial-place of the House of Austria, and it was considered at the time a mark of special favour to permit the intrusion of less illustrious clay into that dark and exclusive tenement. At the request of "der gute Franz" (as Francis was called), his coffin was placed next to that of his "dear grandson."

ANNUITIES GRANTED AND CEASED SINCE 1810.—A parliamentary paper, showing "the amount of annuities for lives and for terms of years granted in each year, since 1810 inclusive, and the amount of capital stock cancelled in each and each year on account of such terminable annuities," was printed on Monday by order of the House of Commons. It appears that the annuities for lives granted from the 1st September, 1806, to the year ending the 5th January, 1851 amounted to £24 4,734 18s. 6d. The annuities granted for terms of lives within the same period amounted to £2 694,507 10s. 6d. The number of life annuities which expired since 1810 amounted to £1,434,881 2s.; and the number of annuities for terms of years to £799,346 8s. 6d. The capital stock transferred and cancelled, including stock purchased with money since 1816, was £26 989,32 19s. 8d. The long annuities thus ceased and cancelled amount to £24 670. The capital stock transferred and cancelled, with respect to annuities for terms of years, was £19 765,848, and the long annuities transferred and cancelled to £141,269 14s. The amount of Exchequer bills purchased and cancelled in addition was £1,841,915 9s. 6d.

The Universe says that Mr. Thomas Graves Law, of Winchester School, aged 15 years, and Miss Helen Anne Law, aged 19, children of the Hon. William Law, were received into the bosom of the Roman Catholic Church at Boulogne, on January 12, by Father Ferrara.

The Society of Arts' medal for the production of "the best colour-box, containing the greatest number of best colours for general use, to be sold retail at one shilling," has, it is stated, been awarded to Joshua Rogers, of 14, Bunhill-row.

An influential meeting was held at Manchester on Tuesday, at which Mr. Ashton Barritt was present, when a resolution was proposed to the effect that the trade and commerce of this kingdom with all countries of the civilized world called for the adoption of an uniform penny postage as a means of extending peace, and extending the philanthropic and Christian movements of the age.

THE FAMILY COLONIZATION LOAN SOCIETY.

In the Times City article of Friday week there appeared a notice of the efforts now being made to promote extensive emigration to Australia, in the course of which the following observations occur:—

It appears that the plan lately recommended for organising a system of emigration to Australia on sound business principles is likely to be attempted without delay, and that the Family Colonization Loan Society, founded by Mr. Chisholm, will constitute its basis. The course of that society has been to send out emigrants of good character in family groups, a portion of the necessary expenses being advanced, to be repaid from their earnings in the colony. . . . Success, hitherto, has been remarkable, so far as its limited construction allows; but the object now is to give it a commercial bearing that shall ensure its extension so as to meet the existing emergency. The funds supplied by Mrs. Chisholm's society have been raised by voluntary contributions, and, although it was found that strong reliance could be placed on the eventual repayment of the loans made, and that consequently the principal sum would long be kept intact, the interest has not as yet been paid off, there was no provision for a proper rate of interest, nor for such additional payment as would cover the risk from occasional defaulters. The plan, therefore, in its state recommended itself merely to those who regarded it for its philanthropy, and, as is usually the case when the fact is lost sight of, that true philanthropy should be made consistent with mutual advantage, some of the best wishes of its promoters were at the same time counteracted.

This statement has called forth an explanation from Mrs. Chisholm, which appeared in the Times of Wednesday last, and which, as the subject is of much interest, and attracts general attention at the present time, we give in her own words; viz.—

(To the Editor of the TIMES.)

SIR,—In carrying out my system of emigration, as a means of doing good, I value my character in respect to the commercial details as highly as any merchant in the City, and must, therefore, ask permission to say a few words to distinguish some remarks which appeared in the Times City article" on Friday last. I will not occupy your space by explanations of my reasons for a steady perseverance in establishing the Family Colonization Loan Society, but confine my observations to a few facts. In the first formation of the society the idea was to charge a moderate interest on each loan, and that very term was in the original manuscript prospectus; the discussions of the two first meetings of the committee were also, almost exclusively, devoted to the subject of a moderate interest. There was thus, you will perceive, every assurance set out the principle, but with the very small sum at command for loans, and the clerical aid that would soon become necessary, it was ultimately resolved to adopt simple machinery in connexion with the society, and gather their opinions, as the parties might work harmoniously by a thorough understanding at the commencement. I availed myself of a group meeting, and explained to the members the necessity of adopting some safe pecuniary principle, when, after a short consideration, the plan of charging fees was decided upon as the most simple and best calculated to meet the case; the following was then embodied as a part of the rules and regulations in the prospectus:—

"Fees—Persons on being enrolled as members of the society will have to pay an entrance-fee of one shilling each (the same for children), to meet in part the current expenses of the office, and gather their opinions, and other incidental expenses, all aid is benefiting by the Loan Society must also pay a fee of 1lb. each in addition to their passage-money, and children under fourteen years of age 5s. each. This system is to be a simple one, with the full payment of their loan, and to be added to the reserve fund to meet losses, &c."

The case, therefore, stands thus (not neglecting to take into account that the society is advancing loans always two years before the repayment):—

Amount of loans to emigrants, per Sians Castle, . .	£865	0 0
" " " Brandell	674	0 0
" " " Athenian	524	0 0
Total amount of loans	£2063	0 0
Reserve fees from 501 adults, at 10s. each . .	£251	10 0
" " 260 children, at 5s. each . .	65	0 0
Entrance fees from 761 persons, at 1s. each . .	38	1 0
Total amount of fees	£354	11 0

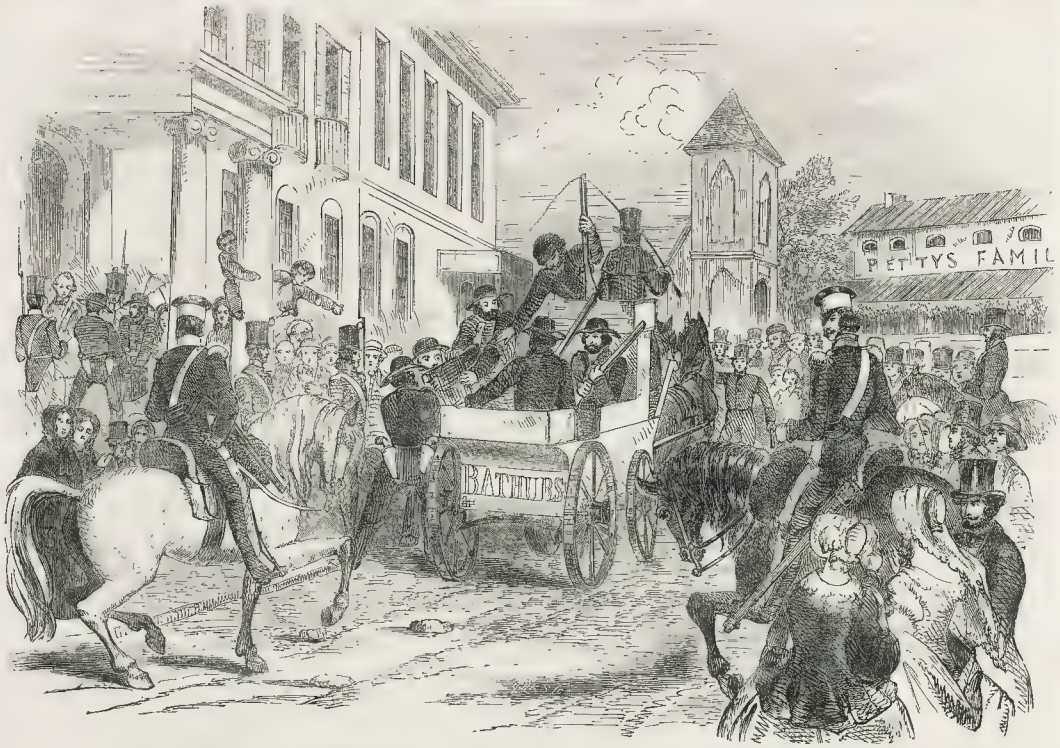
Gratifying as it may be to have my name mentioned with praise in the Times, still I cannot, as the society's parent, allow my promising and healthy child, which I have reared in the suburbs with so much maternal feeling and attention, to be introduced to the world as having the rickets, or suffering from a sick y constitution. I remain, &c.,

January 19. CAROLINE CHISHOLM.

THE ENGINEERS' STRIKE.

An immense mass of correspondence, of numerous and conflicting statements, has occup ed the columns of our daily contemporaries since our last publication, but the facts are few, and afford little prospect of an amicable adjustment. The good-natured endeavours of philanthropic, would-be arbitrators have ended something like those of the bystanders who interfere in a quarrel between man and wife—both masters and employed buffet the friendly advocates for a compromise. Lord Cranworth, who had been consulted by Lord Ashburton, whether the latter should consent to act as arbitrator, replied in the most dignified, and able letter, pointing out to the workmen the invariable result of combinations amongst themselves, namely, that they end in failure, that masters ought to employ whoever they may please for each and every portion of the work, and that workmen are at full liberty to accept or reject the terms of the masters, and that the obvious duty and interest of operatives is to treat the matter as a mere question of bargain. Under the circumstances, the learned judge sees no possibility of an arbitration to solve the difficulty, as he considers the man to have placed themselves in a false position. Lord Cranworth's letter called forth a communication from Viscount Goderich, Messrs. T. Hughes, and A. Vansittart, who were the gentlemen authorised by the executive council of the Amalgamated Society to lay the question of strike before Lords Ashburton and Cranworth, stating that Lord Cranworth had quite mistaken the facts of the case, as the council do not insist that the masters should not employ unskilled labourers, and did not ask for a new compulsory system, and mean to submit to any arbitration whatever, but merely asked for the formation of such a board as exists in France under the title of "Conseil de Prud'hommes," to which any master and men can refer disputes, without the necessity of being so by civil suit. The executive committee of the Central Association of Employers of Operative Engineers issued a manifesto on the 16th, declaring their right to do what they like with their own, their resolve to maintain the rights of their establishments, and their only want, to be let alone. They explain the peculiar position of master engineers, that production is carried on almost entirely to order, and limited as to time in consequence, and consequently cannot be carried on without over-time. They show how by piece-work many of the employed have been enabled to become employers. The real objection to piece-work, they say, is the pretence of protection to those who are indisposed to give a fair day's work for a fair day's wages. Finally, the association announces that the indispensable bases upon which the masters will alone consent to resume their engineering are: 1. The unquestionable right of every adult man to work when what arrangements and engage what workmen he pleases, upon whatever terms they may mutually agree. 2. The unquestionable necessity of providing such securities for the full accomplishment and permanent establishment of these conditions as shall frustrate all attempts of semi-constituted and irresponsible bodies, by intimidation, conspiracy, and outrage, to weaken the rights of emplo ers or the independent privileges of labour."

Last Sunday Mr. Newton, at the Phœnix Tavern, Sydney, described his trip to Lancashire. He dwelt on the enthusiasm at Bury, Oldham, and Manchester, and of the large subscriptions to uphold the cause of the workmen. On Tuesday Mr. Allen, the general secretary, at a meeting of the executive council, announced that only fourteen of votes from 72 branches out of 120, as to the grant of £10,000 from the funds of the society, had been received. He added, that the returns in favour of the proposition of the council were 69 out of the 72 districts. The co-operative plan, however, is not to be proceeded with pari passu. Private contributions are coming in from free kingdom to fellow and the council call upon employers may desire to engage him. 3. The unquestionable prerogative of every employer to determine what arrangements and engage what workmen he pleases, upon whatever terms they may mutually agree. 4. The indispens



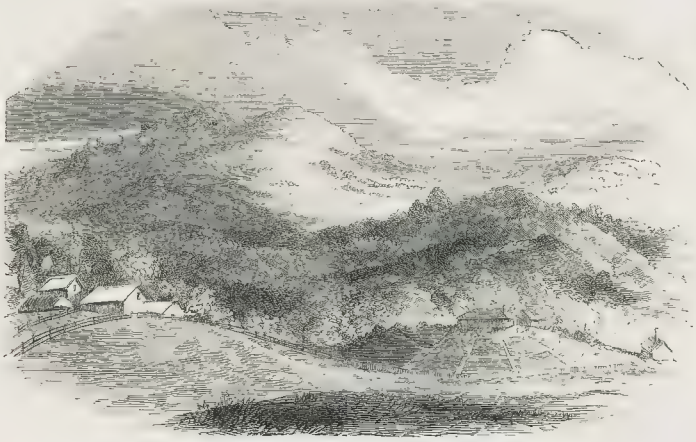
ARRIVAL OF THE GOVERNMENT GOLD CONVEYANCE AT THE COLONIAL TREASURY, SYDNEY, ON AUGUST 21, 1851; FROM A SKETCH BY MARSHAL CLAXTON.

AUSTRALIA.—THE BATHURST GOLD DISTRICT.

We have been favoured by two Correspondents with the accompanying Views of interesting incidents and localities in the Australian Gold District, the intelligence received from whence, detailed in page 74, is very important.

The first Illustration shows the arrival, on August 24, of the Government Gold Conveyance at the Colonial Treasury, which, said the Sydney Morning Herald of August 22, "has the prospect of being illustrated in a very attractive form throughout Europe and America. Mr. Claxton was on the spot, awaiting the arrival of the escort with its golden freight; and a dashing sketch from his artistic pencil, embracing the characteristic group which surrounded the vehicle containing the largest portion of the last week's yield at the gold diggings, will be forwarded by the earliest mail to the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS. In addition to yesterday's consignments of gold by the Government conveyance and the mail, large quantities were brought down by individuals. Mr. R. Campbell Jun., purchased about £1000 worth from miners who arrived in Sydney on foot. Among those who yesterday applied at the Treasury for the golden parcels were the anxious wives of industrious and lucky miners, whose faces, at once expressive of both hope and fear, will form by no means the least interesting feature of Mr. Claxton's sketch. The last three numbers of the Bathurst Free Press have been printed but half the usual size, in consequence of some of the compositors having gone to the diggings."

BATHURST PLAINS, FROM THE WHITE ROCK SCHOOL-HOUSE.



COOMBING SYDNEY, FORTY MILES BEYOND BATHURST, WHERE GOLD WAS FOUND IN 1849.

KELSWICK FOUR MILES FROM SYDNEY, ON THE GREAT WESTERN ROAD.

The three other Sketches are by an amateur.

Kelswick, the property of James Norton, Esq., is situated four miles from the city of Sydney, on the Great Western Road. The mansion is spacious, containing suites of rooms of good proportions; it stands in a park of about 100 acres, in which the owner has shown excellent taste in clumping the timber and cutting glades, giving nearer and more distant views of the surrounding country.

The view of Bathurst Plains, looking about north-west, is taken from the "White Rock School-House," and gives a good idea of the "plains" which occur in many parts of New South Wales. When first discovered they were clothed with very rich grass, but no appearance of timber having ever grown upon them; their edges are bounded with the usual endless forest of the country. Bathurst Plains are about twelve miles long, by eight broad. The town in the distance towards the left is Bathurst, 120 miles from Sydney; that towards the right, with the church on the hill, Kelso. The winding track through the Plain, first past with numerous Brake trees of swamp oak, &c., marks the course of the river Macquarie.

Coombing, forty miles beyond Bathurst from Sydney, is the property of Thomas Icely, Esq., member of the Legislative Council. Here his friends have often experienced a cordial and elegant hospitality. The large buildings to the left of the Sketch are the wool-stores, barns, stables, &c. Around is a large extent of cultivated alluvial soil. The double-headed mountain in the background is called Mount Macquarie.

GOLD IN CALIFORNIA.

Of the many Illustrations of this new Gold Field which the obliging intelligence of Correspondents has enabled us, from time to time, to present to the readers of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, the large View upon the preceding page presents the most practical picture. It has been sketched by Mr John Borth wick, a clever water-colour painter, who first visited the locality as a gold-seeker, but is now settled in the neighbourhood, and is actively engaged in his profession, by taking portraits of successful adventurers, chiefly to be sent to their friends at a distance. In will be seen that, besides present ng us with a picture, our ingenious Correspondent has sketched with equal minuteness the industrial economy of his extraordinary scene.

KANAHA BAR.

The place which this Sketch represents, is situated on the South Fork of the American River, about 18 miles below Coloma, where gold was first discovered. The river shows an open space of sand in the bed of the river, below which turns the water by means of a dam from their natural channel into a wooden flume or aqueduct laid on the rocks at the side of the river. The operation of working the bed of a river requires such an outlay of capital and labour before any of the precious metal can be extracted, that it is always undertaken by companies of from ten to twenty men. They begin by posting a notice on any conspicuous part of the claim, intimating how far such claim extends each way, and their intention of working it at the proper season. If they neglect to work it, however, the first summer after posting this notice, other parties may step in and "jump the claim," as the saying is when a man works grounds already claimed by another.

The river is generally drained off a claim by means of a race cut through the bank; but where the nature of the ground will not permit this—as in the present claim, where the mountains rise abruptly from the river, and the banks of the river are but a confused pile of huge rocks—the method here represented, called flumeracing, is resorted to.

At the cost of a great deal of labour and money in moving and blasting rocks, a space has been levelled off sufficiently to admit of the flume being built on it, which is made entirely of wood, and laid on sleepers supported in some places on the rocks, in others resting. The dimensions of the flume are about 15 feet wide by 2 feet deep: just of sufficient capacity to contain the waters of the river during the summer months.

This company number 15 members, and have about 15 hired hands employed. They were two months engaged in building their flume, the timber for which cost them 130 dollars per 1000 feet laid down there. The sleepers and uprights are pine logs, which in some places had to be cut into planks, but in others left round. In the immediate neighbourhood of this claim there are few trees, and the mountains are so precipitous and rocky as to add greatly to the difficulty of the work.

The miners are here represented at work, digging under the large rocks in the bed of the river. While some are moving rocks, picking and shovelling dirt into buckets, others are baling water out of the hole; for, though the river is turned, there is always a great deal of water to contend against, and consequently the ground is worked in small holes, which are filled up as the stones when worked out. One man is employed carrying buckets full of dirt to the sluice, where it is washed and the gold extracted. This method of washing dirt is the most expeditious yet discovered. The sluice is a long wooden trough, about one foot wide by seven or eight inches deep. It is placed at an inclination, and a full stream of water is kept running through it. About twelve feet from the head of the sluice is what is called a ripple-bar, or bar of wood about an inch high at an equal distance below is another ripple-bar, and this last to the floor of the sluice is very nearly level, for which is a shallow wooden box, called a ripple-box, also slightly inclined. A man is stationed at the head of the sluice; and when a dirt-cart is backed up with a four-pronged fork, with which he throws out what stones he finds in the cart, and then wheels up. The rest of the dirt is allowed down by the water; by the time it reaches the first ripple-bar the gold has got separated; and, being to the bottom, is held by it along with the heavier particles of dirt. Should any gold escape over the first, it is caught by the second; but if not saved by that it finds its way into the box under the sluice, where it works its way down through the lighter dirt which the stream of water keeps constantly washing out. The work is carried on by day and night, in two watches of 12 hours each, the gold being washed out in a pan, leaving nothing but the gold, and some fine black sand which is blown out when the work is done for the day. If the gold may be found, but not much; while in the ripple box there is so little that is not thought worth while to wash it out oftener than once a week. The company and the hands they employ, whom they also board, live on the side of the river, as seen in the Sketch, in a camp of tents and wooden huts covered in with branches of trees, forming a sort of shanty, the end of which is constructed of an old tent, stretched on two or three uprights. Here there is a long table with very primitive benches on each side, and at the end a pile of provisions, consisting principally of hams and flour, the staple articles of food in the mines. Here the miners take their meals. The little canvas shanty at the right of this is the residence of one of the company, whose wife has accompanied him to the scene of his labours.

At daybreak may be seen among the rocks, wherever a soft place of ground offers a tempting resting-place, large heaps of human beings, which one would say, of diversified coloured blankets, hats, red, green,—and, here and there a buffalo-rug. Presently, the cook comes out and beats a reveille on his frying-pan with a tin pannikin. Immediately begin to move, shaggy heads appear from under them, and, casting up and rubbing their eyes, the miners go down to the flume, where they go through their ablutions, and very frequently complete the toilet with the aid of a pocket-comb. By this time the cook is again beating furiously on the frying-pan to summon them to breakfast. Not much time is devoted to this ceremony; the day's work begins by baling out the holes, and is continued steadily till sunset, with the exception of an interval of about an hour at noon for dinner

The miners working on the bar or convex side of the river are either working alone, or with one or two partners. They have their tents hard on the side from which the Sketch is taken, wherever a level spot can be found, but most of them are pitched on little platforms built up with rocks. This place is extremely difficult of access. A waggon-road comes to within a quarter of a mile of the base of the mountain, but is so steep that a teamster in any other country would never think of attempting it. From where the waggon-road stops, to the river bank you have to climb down over the rocks the best way you can. Some of the claims in the beds of the river pay very well, while others do not pay the expense of getting a rocker. This company were at an outlay of 3000 dollars, besides their individual labour, for the time and means they were able to work their claim. They have already taken out enough to pay all expenses, and expect the claim to yield a handsome sum to each member of the company before the rainy season comes on, which will probably be in a month or so. Should they not be able to work it out this year, they will break up the flume, and remove the timber out of reach of the river till next season, when nearly as much labour will be gone through again.

PORT OF LONDON GENERAL RETURN.—Number of ships, and their aggregate register tonnage, that entered the port of London with cargoes from foreign ports, during the years ended the 5th January, 1851 and 1852, distinguishing the British from the foreign:—

ASYLUM FOR FEMALE ORPHANS, LAMBETH.—On Thursday a special meeting of the governors of this institution was held at the London Tavern, for the purpose of considering the propriety of granting an entrance to the asylum for a portion of the children rendered destitute by the loss of the Amazon. After some discussion, a resolution was passed for the election of three of the children, which was tantamount to a gift of 300 guineas, as the entrance fee of each child was 100 guineas. A letter was read from the president, the Duke of Cambridge, highly appreciating the steps the committee had taken on this subject.

ROMAN CATHOLIC POOR SCHOOLS.—A meeting of Roman Catholics was held on Monday night, in the chapel in Rosoman street, Clerkenwell, in support of the poor schools of that district. There was a numerous attendance, and the platform was filled with clergymen, among whom were Bishop Morris, Messrs. Kyne, Oakely, and Glennie. Mr. Sheriff Swift attended to reports which had gone abroad respecting his correspondence with the Poor-law Commissioners on the subject of the treatment of the Roman Catholic inmates of the Holborn union. It was perfectly true that he had corresponded with the authorities on the subject, and found, from the best legal advice, that the rights granted by law to the poor members of his faith were not conceded to them in that house, and he was not at an end until their legal rights were duly recognised. Several other addresses were delivered on the necessity of providing all the Roman Catholic poor with asylum and education from a pagandism.

INTENSIVE BURGLARIES.—A daring burglary took place at the shoe warehouse, 36, Great Portland-street, (a corner), which was entered and plundered of several hundred pairs of Wellington boots, 68 pairs of women's boots and shoes, a large quantity of morocco leather, and other property, in value upwards of £200, on the night of the 16th instant. How the burglars contrived to carry away so great a bulk of property without being discovered by the police, or arousing the inmates, is at present a mystery; a neighbouring cab-stand however, is believed to have facilitated their operations.—Information was also received of an equally audacious burglary at No. 4, Stepney-terrace, Bethnal-green road, in which the entire stock in trade of a butterman and cheesemonger was carried off, the unfortunate proprietor being left without a single thing to supply his customers. The constables on duty where these audacious robberies were committed have been suspended by order of the Commissioners of Police.

FRESH GOLD DISCOVERIES IN AUSTRALIA.—THEIR EFFECT ON EMIGRATION.

The effect of the gold discoveries in Australia (some notice of which is given below) has at length begun to be felt in stimulating emigration to that distant but attractive quarter of the globe; but, strange to say, the stimulus is communicated, not by the "unholy thirst for gold" acting with irresistible force upon the unsettled or the needy here at home, but by the efforts of the mercantile body connected with Australia, who, justly apprehensive that the labouring classes in the colony will be drawn off from their ordinary pursuits to the more attractive occupation of gold-seeking at the "diggins," are busy devising some check as early as possible to the evils inflicted by the inadequate supply of labour upon the usual sources of the commercial prosperity of the colony, which without such aid will be checked very much. If, indeed, failed dried up altogether, and a crisis induced by these very discoveries of native wealth which, to other communities, would be a blessing, are certain very speedily to extend and enhance greatly the causes which have hitherto rendered the prosperity of Australia unexampled in British colonial experience.

A preliminary meeting of the mercantile interests of London engaged in, or connected with, the Australian trade was held on the subject in the City, on Friday, the 16th inst., when a plan of emigration, based upon, and connected with, the Family Colonization Loan Society, founded by the benevolent reformer, Mr. Caroline Chisholm, was unanimously adopted. The meeting was attended by all the leading merchants in the trade, and, after the nomination of a committee, subscriptions were announced to the amount of nearly £3000.

In the meantime the Government commissioners are making great exertions to send out some emigrants. So much is this now not appear to the public too manifest that whatever supplies are sent out to recruit the labour market in Australia are wholly furnished by the enterprise and energy of private individuals or societies, without any aid either from the colonial or home Governments, while the large funds placed at the disposal of the Government commissioners for the purposes of emigration produce no result whatever in that respect. Accordingly, being at length shamed into activity, the commissioners despatched on Monday from Birkenhead, in the ship Runnymede, 400 tons burden, a total of 400 emigrants, chiefly natives of Ireland. The Mangerton is to be followed by the Runnymede, from the same port.

With respect to the new discoveries of gold, we find that Port Phillip, likely to eclipse her sister colony of New South Wales:—

Dates from Melbourne to the 6th of October state that deposits had been met with at Buninyeong, about forty miles from the city, and fifty from Geelong, apparently far exceeding in value any yet that have been found within a similar space either at Sydney or in California. The whole population were moving towards the district, and it was already been agreed that the crown lands and rivers for many surrounding miles were likewise rich. The great production, however, had been at one particular spot of limited extent, where the supply was such that the space of eight square feet to each man was considered by the Government Commissioner a sufficient allotment. The number of persons already at the place was upwards of 2000, and care ul calculations seemed to show that the average to each man was at least an ounce a day. Many cases of individual success were most remarkable. One man had obtained £1600 in a week; and another, a blacksmith, had got £1000. A party of three men found 20 lb. weight in a single day, while another found that the crevice had weight. The consequence was a far greater desertion from all ordinary occupations than had been witnessed at Sydney. Hundreds of all classes were leaving daily, including clerks, shopkeepers, mechanics, merchants, and many professional men. There was hardly any possibility of getting shoes or clothes, and the Troubadour, which brought the present intelligence to Bombay, was only enabled to sail by obtaining the complement of men from among the seamen confined on short sentences in the Melbourne gaol. Even that, however, appears to have been attended with difficulty, since it is said only six would accept the offer, all the others preferring to remain their time for the sake of getting ultimately to the mines. Four or five large ships were already for sea, and detained for want of hands. The salaries of the Government officers had been increased 50 per cent, and labour of all kinds had increased in proportion. A Government escort had just arrived with £17,000, and was to return for a further sum of £20,000. The mode of digging appears peculiar, the usual being found at considerable depth of a hole. It is about twenty or twenty-five yards square, and consists of sandy gravel, and clay of various colours, until a very thick substratum of opacity is reached. Immediately above this is, in places, a stratum of chocolate-coloured clay, and it is in the latter that the gold is found; but it is impossible to know what is done, as most keep their earnings secret. I weighed 23 ounces for one man, the whole of which had been found in a day. £35 was refused for a single cradle of the stuff described above, £70." The licenses were paid out merely without hesitation, but with avidity.

As to the New South Wales "diggins," the accounts by the overland mail describe the excitement which the further discovery of gold had produced as extraordinary, and it was increased daily as the accounts from the mines furnished additional evidence of the abundance of the precious metal.

His Excellency the Governor had proceeded to the diggings on the 2d October.

The Sydney Morning Herald advocates the establishment of a colonial mint as important to the colonies, under the belief that the discovery of such large quantities of gold would have a deteriorating effect upon the price of wool and other produce, whilst the operations of a mint would probably cause gold to be less an article of merchandise than at present. Considerable difficulty had been experienced to find money to pay for the large remittances of the precious metal from the mines, and the banks had been obliged to limit their advances, whilst many of the mercantile houses were compelled to suspend purchases for the present. It was, under these circumstances, in contemplation to issue gold tokens of 20s. each, in order to afford some relief from the difficulties thus experienced in all monetary transactions. At the rate at which the gold was arriving at Sydney, upwards of half a million sterling of coin would be required in the space of the next five months to pay for it.

The Bathurst Free Press states that—

Colonel Mundy has recently been on a tour through the gold district, to satisfy himself by personal inspection of the correctness of the astonishing reports which have been published concerning the productiveness of the gold-mines. But the most immediate object of his visit is said to be to ascertain the desirability of locating a body of troops in the district, and we are informed that after his return to Sydney he will start for England as early as arrangements can be made, and that his purpose is to recommend the immediate transmission of a military force to the gold regions of Australia. As this step will be taken without the consent of the representatives of the people, we presume the mother country will bear the expense of whatever military the Home Government may choose to send us.

Another colonial paper says:

The quantity of gold coming in from the mining districts is now so large as to create considerable excitement in the community. Messrs. Thacker and Co. having presented the public to inspect the 160 lb. of gold that caused a stoppage on the part of the bankers to get and try their fortunes in the gold district. Ordinary occupations have become too tame, and the minds of labourers, mechanics, and others become more unsettled. Numbers who, a short time since, resorted from Ophir, a distance of 30 miles, to get work for 6 and 7 shillings a day, are now proceeding to the Turon; whilst the announcement that gold has been discovered in the Hunter's River district, on the Liverpool Plains, distant 200 miles from Maitland, and drawn many persons to the spot.

With regard to the workings at the mines, it is stated that one person had obtained 80 lb. weight of gold in four days, and at the Victoria diggings, eight feet square of ground had produced 2300 oz. of gold. On the 28th of September the Government escort brought no less than 5000 oz., and on the 29th 960 oz., which, with other parcels, made a total of 6456 oz. in one day.

Amongst the latest parcels received at Sydney is a splendid lump of 7 oz. 7 dwt., found at Ophir. This is one of the best specimens yet discovered, and is remarkably free from quartz. Another piece weighed 75 oz. 3 dwt.

Two ounces of quartz from the estate of Mr Icely, having been pulverised and amalgamated with quicksilver, produced a button of metal weighing 7 8 grains, which, on analysist on by Mr Porter, was found to contain silver, 3·1 gold, 9·65; alloy, 87·20. At this rate, a ton of quartz would yield about 170 oz., value £620. The quartz exhibited no appearance of gold, even under a powerful microscope. Arrangements are being made for an experiment on a large scale.

More than half the gold came down from the mines on private hand and through the post, so that a correct estimate of the receipts could not be obtained; but they must be unquestionably large, as is shown by the arrival here during the past week of £100,000 by the Mountstewart Elphinstone, Anna Maty, and Ralph Thompson.

The letters and papers from Van Diemen's Land announce the discovery of a small portion of gold in that colony, and a number of persons were out "prospecting." There had been a meeting of the colonists, who had subscribed a sum of £500 to be given to the person who first found gold in any quantity.

MUSIC.

THE ENGLISH GLEE AND MADRIGAL UNION.

The second season commenced last Monday night, at Willis's. There was a full and fashionable attendance. Since this association opened its last year's campaign, under the patronage of her Majesty, an extensive provincial tour has been made, and everywhere the lovers of pure English social harmony have been delighted with the performances of the singers.—Mrs Endersohn, Miss M. Williams, Mr. Lockey, Mr. Francis, Mr. Hobbs, Mr. Land, and Mr. H. Phillips. The great success and popularity of this Union is another striking proof how much by care a musical public may be found to appreciate a specialty of purpose, if efficiently carried out. In the works of the old English masters we have a mine of melody with a gauge as vein of harmony therein; but of late years our vocal singers have been unwilling to imitate the Italian operatic school, instead of endeavouring to turn the taste of our amateurs towards our glorious glees and magnificent madrigals. When the English Glee and Madrigal Union began their morning concerts at Willis's Rooms, fashionable audiences were amazed at the beauty of the compositions, at the science and quaintness of the poetry, and at the remarkable taste, feeling, and finish of the executants. A small band of singers thoroughly trained, and the majority of them accustomed, for years, to interpret the glee and madrigalian masterpieces effected quite a revolution in our concerts; and, although the meetings were given in the very thick of the first Exhibition days, when nearly musical speculation was a sleeping dream, Willis's Rooms were crowded more and more thronged, and the vogue of the glee and madrigal became quite in the ascendant, as in the days of our ancestors. The ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS was one of the earliest and most active supporters of the English Glee and Madrigal Union; and it is gratifying to find that our contemporaries, who were either cold, indifferent, or negligent of the subsequent performances, have one by one come round to the consideration that a Kingsbook school of the Madrigal is indispensable as well as of other countries. Our native artists must, also, not lose sight of the moral conveyed in the triumph of the undertaking: they will see that unison is strength; and that the singer who can conscientiously sing his part in an ensemble is quite as much valued as the conceited zealot who strives to be the all-absorbing object of attraction in the concert-room or on the stage. In short, what we have again and again pointed out to our native talent is, to acquire distinction within our own boundaries of art—to attempt little, but what is great, and to endeavour to do right well.

Monday's programme comprised Orlando Gibbons' madrigal, "The silver swan," and the following glees: Horsley's "By Celia's arbour," Webbe's "Ye spotted snakes," Stafford Smith's "Blest pair of sirens," Webbe's "When winds breathe soft," Sir H. R. Bishop's "Blow, gentle gales," Arne and Bishop's "Under the greenwood tree," and Dr. Cooke's "Hand in hand," all well-known gems. The scheme was divided into three parts, the first and third containing the pieces just cited, and the second being devoted to a few more: Mr. Francis sang Dr. Arnold's pretty melody, "Delia;" Mr. Lockey Purcell's delicious air, "I attempt from love's sickness;" Miss Williams, Dr. Blow's fine song, "The self-banished" (encored); Mr. Phillips, Purcell's "Mad Bess;" Mrs. Endersohn, Handel's "Lascia ch'io pianga" (from Queen "Rinaldo"), and Mrs Endersohn and Mr. Phillips, Travers' clever duet, "Haste, my Nanette."

The execution as well as the selection afforded the highest gratification. Mr. Land was an able accompanyist in the second part.

ST. MARTIN'S HALL.

Mr John Hullah commenced on Wednesday night the second season of his Classical Concerts of Ancient and Modern Music. The series, for 1852 will consist of four nights, the three succeeding ones being February 18th, March 17th, and April 21st. The opening programme comprised Mendelssohn's 95th Psalm, "Come let us sing," the solo by Miss Birch, Miss Alleyne, and Mr. Swift, a new air by Mr. Wiley, and an overture by Mr. Blagrove. The trio was encored, but lacks individuality of style. Mr. Wiley's forms and ideas are evidently based on the Mendelssohnian school, whilst those of Mr Lee is waver between the manner of Spohr's dramatic writing and that of Mendelssohn. The latter was encored before she can be considered as an artiste, and Miss Birch's vocalisation was not so steadily in tune as could be desired. Mr. Swift's sympathetic voice will tell more again if he can time more accurately. Haydn's trio is tedious. Mr. Macfarren's new cantata, "Leonora," was in the first instance announced, but afterwards withdrawn, and, as we learn, definitively. The hall was well attended, and the performances went off without hitch or delay. Messrs. Lindsay Sloper and Mr. Macfarren were the conductors; and the artists who kindly gave their gratuitous aid were Miss Kate Loder and Miss A. Goddard, who performed admirably a duo on Mendelssohn's Concertante for two pianofortes, Mr. Balsir Chatterton, who executed his harp fantasia, "Homage to Bellini," Mr. Pilkington and his sons, who were entered in a quartet from Rossini's "Stabat Mater" on three hand-horns; accompanied by Mr. Ella, Louise Vinn, Mrs. Manners, Miss Rainsford, Mrs. Weiss, Miss Dolby, Madame Macfarren, Miss Poe of Miss Ransford, Mr. Harrison, Mr. Benson, and Mr. Weiss, vocalists. Mr Graham Cooke was present, but, in consequence of his oboe and the piano not being tuned to the same pitch, his fantasia was also omitted. It is worthy not only remark but of censure, that the entire programme did not contain one of Hewitt's beautiful ballads, or any of the works for which he gained prizes from the Melodists' Club. As further donations will be required by Mr. E. Addison, of Regent street, the music publisher, it is to be hoped the unfortunate musicians will not be forgotten, now that he is rid and.

The known engagements made by Mr. F Gye for the Royal Italian Opera this season are Grisi, Viardot, Mdme. Castellan, Mdlle. Bertrand, and Mdlle Cotti, Signori Mario, Tamberlik, Mei, Herr Formes, Signor Rosconi, Signor Bartolini (a new baritone from the Brussels Italian Opera), Signor Tagliafico, Signor Tomkinson, Mr. Land, Mr. Parrot, ballet master; and Mr. Costa, musical director, composer, and conductor.

A concert took place at Cosby Hall, on Wednesday night, in aid of the funds for the evening classes for young men; the artists were Miss Poole, the Misses Steggall, Messrs. Swift, F. R. Venge, Vernin, Lutz, and G. Case.

Mdlle. Jenny Lind was to have commenced a series of farewell concerts in America, in the Metropolitan Hall, New York, on the 30th ult., but, owing to the death of her mother, she has resolved to return to Sweden, and will be at Liverpool about the 4th of February, coming over in the Atlantic, the same steamer in which she embarked for New York. Miss Catherine Hayes was also giving some concerts in the Metropolitan Hall, New York, up to the end of December, with Mr Augustus Braham, Herr Meugis, and Mr. Lavenu, with great success, and is now on an extensive southern tour.

An amateur concert has been given in the Natural History Society's Room at Worcester, for the amusement of the gentry of the county, including the Bishop of Worcester and Mrs. Pepys, Lord Sandys, Lord and Lady Henley, Hon. W. and Mrs. Coventry, Hon. and Rev. H. Coventry, Sir T. and Lady Winnington, Downes Lady Winnington, Sir E. and Lady Lechmere, Sir G. and Lady Wakeman, Sir J. and Lady Pakington, Sir Adam and the Misses Gay, Honourable Temple Harris, the Dean of Worcester, Mrs., Mr. and Mrs. H. Reed, Mr. and Lady Isabella Peddington, Hon. and Rev. E. Lyttelton, Rev. Canon and Mrs. Wood, J. S. Westhead, Esq., M.P., &c. Amongst the amateurs were Sir John Pakington, Bart., M.P., who sang the Spanish song to the Guitar, Mrs. Tomkinson, the Misses Temple, Miss Lechmere, the Misses Wynneatt, Miss M. Barkeley, &c. A new amateur society has just been formed in Devonport, entitled the Devon and Cornwall Philharmonic Society. At the second concert, in St. George's Hall, Stonehouse, Lord Graves, Chairman, sang a solo from Cimarosa's "Matrimonio Segreto." Mrs. Trelawny, the lady of the member for Tavistock, Miss Maunting, and Dr. Yonge, a tenor, were the other amateurs. The professors were Miss Vaughan, a contralto singer from London, Mr. W. H. Reed, violinist, and Mr. Smythe, of the Royal Marines.

At the fourth of the London Thursday Concerts, on the 22d inst., the vocalists were Miss Louisa Pyne, Madame Parodi (from Italy), Miss Thornton, Mr. Sims Reeves, and Mr. Weiss. The new pianist was Sofi Gerard (pseudo). The band of the 1st Life Guards, and the Madrigal Choir, conducted by Mr. I. Severn, were introduced in the scheme.

The new comic opera by Mr. Howard Glover, the libretto by Mr. John Oxenford, "Admiral Coquette," produced last night at the Haymarket Theatre, will be noticed in our next impression.

Herr Sommer, with the Hungarian band, gave a concert at the Stone Hall, in the City, on Saturday night.

On Monday will be given the second evening concert of the English Glee and Madrigal Union and Italian Opera, at the Royal Soho Theatre; on Tuesday will be Mr. Aguilar's second soirée; on Wednesday the Sacred Harmonic Society will perform Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" and "Athalie," under Costa's direction, and the second of the City Wednesday Concerts will take place, the London Thursday Concert will be on the 29th, and on the same morning the first of Mr. Ella's Musical Union Soirées will be given, and on Friday the London Sacred Harmonic Society will perform Mendelssohn's "Elijah," under Mr. Surman's direction.

FOREIGN MUSICAL NEWS.

We regret to announce that the celebrated composer, Luigi Ricci, died lately on his way to St. Petersburg, where he was to have produced his opera, "Rolla," for Grisi and Mario. Frederick and Luigi Ricci, the brothers, who composed many operas together, were born at Naples, at the beginning of the present century; they were pupils of Zingarelli. The late Luigi Ricci has produced "Corradino di Genova," at the Theatre Valle, Rome, in 1826, "I Nuovo Figaro," at Parma; "Le Nozze di Figaro," "Un Avventura di Scaramuccia" (a capital comic opera), "Chiara di Rosenbergh" (the libretto of which Balfe took for his "Rose of Castelle"), at the Scala in Milan; "Ulisse in Itaca," "Che dura Vince," "I Due Serzenti." Frederick Ricci, who is often named erroneously as the composer of the above works, wrote "La Prigione di Edimburgo," "Un Duello sotto Richelieu," produced at the Scala in 1839; "Corrado d'Altamera," and "Vallombra." "Il Diserto per Amore," a charming opera is the joint work of the two brothers, and was brought out at Naples in 1836, with Mme. Persiani and Ronconi as also "Il Sonnambulo," and "L'Eroina del Messico, cosa il Ferando Cortez" in the original cast of "Il Corrado" were Brambilla, the contralto, and Gassoc, the tenor (who is now in Paris), and Varesi, the baritone. It was done at her Majesty's Theatre in 1844, with Grisi, Favanti, Mario, and Formasari.

Herr Fuchs' new opera, "Guttenberg," has been successfully produced at the Court Theatre in Vienna. Herrn Eri and Standigl had the principal parts, and were frequently called before the curtain.

Mendelssohn's "Son and Stranger" has been brought out at the Theatre Royal in Berlin with signal success. Their Majesties and the other members of the Royal family honoured the first representation with their presence. This work had only been befo. given at one of the minor theatres in the Prussian capital. Herr Rosenhain's "Démon de la Nuit," originally heard in Paris, and afterwards at Frankfort, is to be produced under the auspices of Meyerbeer in Berlin. A new grand opera by Herr Doru, "The Sherif (Ecosvin) of Paris," was also in preparation.

Mdlle Frieri having been indisposed, the run of the new ballet, "Vari-vert," has been interrupted at the Grand Opera in Paris; but Scribe and Halévy's five-act opera, "Le Juif Errant," was nearly ready for representation. M. Gounod's "Sarte" continues to be played: he lately composed some music to the "Bourgeois Gentilhomme," at the Théâtre Français, and successful was his incidental music of the same style, that some critics went into ecstasies at the "divine music of Lully," the original composer of the introduced music in Molière's comedy. A brief epitome of the history of the Opera in Paris, from the time of Louis XIV. granting, in 1672, to Lully the privilege of the Royal Academy of Music, which was withdrawn at the 1848 revolution, has been restored; but with this symbol of Royalty has been added that of Imperialism, two eagles having been suspended above the figures of Fame and Victory upholding the escutcheon. Farloit's success in Donizetti's "Maria di Rohan," at the Théâtre Italien, has been most decided; on all hands the advent of a fine baritone is admitted. Madame Fiorentini has also given indications of advance in Maria; she sang her la t air admirably, and was recalled with Ferlotti; Graseo was Chalais, Durrez's opera, "L'Ange de la Madonne" is to be produced at the Lyrique National, for the début of his daughter, Mdlle Caroline Duprez; and Balfe's "Bohemian Girl" will be brought out at the same establishment.

THE THEATRES.

DRURY LANE.

On Friday week was performed the "Hunchback," with Miss Glyn as Julia, and Miss Fitzpatrick as Helen. The latter played with her usual vivacity and stage tact. Miss Glyn met with the wide success of her previous in Julia: we never knew her more impulsive or energetic. In many points her conception of the character is peculiar, but she justifies it by her admirable execution. Mr. Anderson, as Master Walter, was witnessed in one of his best roads. Mr. Be ton was the Modus. The entire play was finely rendered, the company being effic ent for a drama of this class, though not for one of a more complex str cture. The audience were remarkably applansive; and Miss Glyn received an ovation at the end of the fourth act as well as that of the last act. On Monday she performed Lady Macbeth for the last time during her present engagement, but returns in about a month to personate the Egyptian Cleopatra.

The operatic season was to have commenced on Thursday night, with Balfe's popular opera "Fra Diavolo," strongly cast, Mr. and Mrs Sims Reeves making their first appearance this season; but, some time after the usual period of opening the doors, placards were posted, with a medical certificate thereon, explaining that Mrs. Sims Reeves was not sufficiently well to sing before this night (Saturday). Lee's "Bella's Stratagem," and the Bateman children in "The Young Couple," were substituted for the opera. Why Miss Poole, who is a great favourite during Zerlina, did not replace Mrs. Sims Reeves, it is possible to guess. The audience, although warned at the doors of the change, would not allow the early scenes of the comedy to be heard. Even on the entry of Mr. Manvers, the stage manager, appeal in loudest accents to the public. The cr us for "Bunn!" were incessant, until the lessee appeared and addressed the auditory, offering to return to a com y to the mischief-makers, and telling them, with truth, that it expand ll the notice of the plagues and annoyances to which managers were subjected. Peace was restored by Mr. Bunn's emposatic speech, which was generally applauded.

Mlle. Nau's "Robert le Diable," with the new singers, Mdlle. Garcia, Mr. Fedar, Mr. Drayton, and Miss Crichton, was announced for last night, and will be noticed in our next publication.

The Jullien nights have been so strongly patronized, that the lessee will repeat the ad ditional performance of the Bateman chi dren and the pops as pantomime next week.

PRINCESS'.

On Saturday the "Iron Chest" was performed. Mr. Charles Kean's Sir Edward Mortimer has not received the notice it merits. This has been doubtless owing to the presence of pantomime and burlesque in almost every theatre in the metropolis. That in this and similar characters Mr. C. Kean evidences genius akin to his father's, no doubt can remain on the mind of competent judges. The delineation is not on y brilliant, but so frequent as to cast into shade more and more numerous defects. Apart from these, the spectator realises a degree of mental attitude in the actor for the part in question His first appearance in the library is picturesque, and the so l copy so delivered as to evince that the passage in mind and feature has gained a pervading influence in the being of the man commingled with his heart's life-blood. For this motive we pardon his suspicion, his violence and his inconsistency. One point we never recollect to have seen mare well a final is about: we allude to the oath thereon by Mortimer. The terms of the imprecation were dictated in a low subdued tone, gradually rising into vehemence, which thrilled with terror and appalled with awe. There was the preceding calm, and there was the after tempest. Effects of this kind are popular to Mr. Charles Kean; no other actor now-a-days can produce them. The play, was read notarial, is well acted throughout. Mr. Creswick's Wilford had, indeed, many points of excellence. Miss Fra ks land was Helen. This young lady does not improve on better a quaintance—for force she sub-limits exaggeration, and in her attitudes was uncraceful.... Still there was an honesty of purpose in her acting which speaks favourably for her earnest ess—and this of itself is a ground of hope. But she requires instruction and discipline, to regulate as we l as to sustain her powers.

STRAND.

Another new piece has been produced, under the title of the "Juvenile Party," for the purpose of employing the talents of Mr. Charles Selby. In this she personates a maiden aunt, Miss Bittery, who conducts the education of her nephew, Master Charles Criterion, as she does everything else, upon principle. The child, of course, is spoiled, and permitted all manner of mischief. Another boy, in the course of the piece, is contrasted with the "pickle" in question—a Master Bounce, the son of a captain, who flogs him into obedience. The result of the two different plans of bringing up are exhibited in a juvenile party, the members of which do what they well, and thus severally illustrate their personal dispositions and training. The notion is decidedly a good one, and the piece was deservedly successful.

WOOLWICH.

On Monday and Wednesday the theatre was crowded to witness Mr H Betty and Miss Edith Heraud, in the "Lady of Lyons" and "Macbeth." The former in both characters acted admirably, and the latter gave fresh examples of that extraordinary histrionic aptitude which has already acquired her so much distinction. Indeed, she improves with every opportunity, and unites refinement with power.

MDLLE. WAGNER.—For many months past musical report from Berlin has been unremitting in its praises of a new star in the horizon, whose fascinations seem to have created an unparalleled sensation in that capital, nearly considered co d and unenthusiastic. The new cress is Mdlle. Wagner, who is described as uniting to a soprano of unsurpassed magnificence, dramatic power more of the very highest order — Born, so to speak, upon the stage, Mdlle Wagner began almost in her childhood to exhibit those rare gifts which since rise to such an early splendour. In the grand creat ons of Gluck, Spontini, and Meyerbeer she is pronounced by classicists to be altogether inimitable, one of her great parts being Fidès, in which rôle she has created Mme. Viardot at Berlin, and by the grandeur of her acting, where she recognises her son in the crowned impostor, produced an effect on the public unknown before in the annals of the theatre. Mdlle. Wagner was at once sought to be engaged by the Royal Intendant for ten years, upon terms never before granted to any artiste in Germany; this offer she accepted, with the reservation of the right to leave the year for foreign engagements. She has engaged at the Royal Italian Opera in Paris, and is now performing there to crowded houses by the two tackles not being lowered together; and this fact, combined with many others on record, suggested to Mr. Landells a simple means of lowering a boat so that she must fall flat into the sea: and it will not take altogether two minutes to accomplish this.

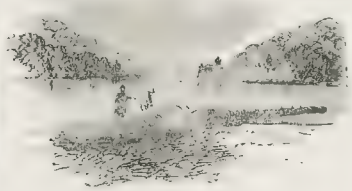
It is necessary to state the above, in order to make quite clear to the non-professional reader the difficulties connected with the plan at present in use, before we describe the simple invention of Mr. Landells. By his plan only one tackle is used; this is taken from the centre of the boat to a ring that connects the slings by which the boat is supported, as shown in the Engraving. The weight of the boat is equally divided into six parts; and, while it consists of an equal balance, the supports do not in any way interfere with the stowage, and the lines serve as a support for persons getting into her. The boat is hauled up and is perfectly secured by a simple pin. A rod of iron, with a hole in the centre, is fixed near the bow and stern of the boat; and, being pulled up into the pin which is fixed downwards from the end of the iron stay by which the tackle is pulled up, the boat is firmly secured; so that, if even she were full of passengers, she could not cant in the least. A line is attached to the fore and aft iron stay, and, being kept coiled up at each end of the boat, it will serve as a perfect support to any one holding it, or in steadying the boat to the water.

Mr. Landells proposes to submit his invention to the Lords of the Admiralty and also to the Board of Trade; and, as the expense is trifling, being less than that of the present plan, we have no doubt the subject will receive attention, as it is not only of interest to our own country, but to every maritime power in the world. The present invention requires only the rope that pulls the boat up to be let go, and this can be done by one hand, while the weight of the boat clears her from all fastening. We have the authority of Mr. Forster, one of the survivors of the crew of the Amazon, to state, that, in his opinion, had this plan been in use on board that ill-fated vessel, every one that could have got on deck would have been saved.

THE "AMAZON."

EVERY phase of the loss of this ill-fated vessel possesses a melancholy interest, in proportion to the circumstantial minuteness with which the catastrophe has been narrated by the survivors. By aid of Mr. Neilson, who has obligingly furnished our Artist with the requisite information, we are enabled to present the accompanying picture of the sad scene, showing the unfortunate vessel after she had been put before the wind—the engines still at work, driving her at full speed through the water; and at the period when the life-boat in which Mr. Neilson and others of the survivors escaped had safely taken the water, notwithstanding the heavy surf which they had to contend with from the paddles. The fire had by this time arrived so far aft as to be bursting through the main hatch, and the man at the fore-davit fall of the life-boat was severely burnt while in the act of lowering her.



MAST (PRESUMED OF THE "AMAZON") DRIFTED ASHORE AT DARTMOUTH.

From Bridport has been communicated the following information:—

A portion of the paddle-box and some of the machinery of a large new steamer have been washed ashore at Bridport, and is supposed to be a part of the ill-fated Amazon, lost a few days since. Information has already been forwarded to the Admiralty; and the officers of her Majesty's Customs have taken active measures for securing the portion of the wreck, which is of some value, on account of the quantity of copper and brass which is attached to it.

We have been favoured with the following from Dartmouth:—

On the morning of Monday, the 19th January, the crew of the pilot-boat Fanny picked up the (supposed) mast of the Amazon, floating about 7 miles west of the Start Lighthouse.

The accompanying Sketch shows the Mast as it now lies on the Custom-house quay, in charge of Messrs. R. L. Kingston and Son, receivers of droits of Admiralty for Dartmouth. A portion of a white gauze veil was found hanging to one of the iron bolts with which the spar is thickly studded. The mast is in great part burnt, as may be seen by the manner in which the wood is reduced in size from the hoops. It is about 52 feet long, and in some parts 6 or 7 feet in circumference

The Sketch is by Mr. C. J. Way, of Dartmouth, and shows the Mast and entrance to the Harbour and Castle of Dartmouth.

THE STEREOSCOPE, PSEUDOSCOPE, AND SOLID DAGUERREOTYPES.

THE present day fortunately so abounds in invention, that, no matter how unexpected or curious a discovery may be, it scarce excites any wonder Tell people that you can brew lightning in a little crock, and send it for hundreds of miles over land and under sea, they don't quite believe you until they have had a message between London and Paris answered; and then they take the whole matter quietly for granted as a thing of course, and go home and think no more about it. Announce that an engraving showing every detail of an interior of the Exhibition was engraved from a picture taken in ten ticks of a watch, people smile and look incredulous; but let them stay, watch in hand, and count the seconds whilst the daguerreotype camera window is open, then show them the picture, and let them on the spot look from it to the reality until they have recognised every minutest particular, they will begin to speculate how cheap should be the picture so instantaneously produced; and with the fact before them, and no cabalistic flourishes or witchcraft doings in the matter, all wonder ceases True, where discovery cannot so plainly produce its proof, ignorance and presumption, scepticism and unbelief, still find refuge enough for boastful sneers against labourers in the hidden mines of fact and truth We have not yet reached the period when all men shall be content to bear announced discoveries however strange with patience, or else shall lend their help to working out the truth, or grinding down, atom by atom, the falsehood or fallacy; but we have at all events passed the age when the cloven-foot of some evil spirit was looked for side by side with every step of progress that human intelligence attained. Time was, when it would have gone hard with any one who showed pictures of men and scenes that neither pencil-brush nor hand had touched; and if, in defence, it had been asserted that the sun itself had traced them, the tortures of the rack would have been had in requisition to force the inventor to confess himself a wizard, and to tell his terms of compact with the devil, and, even in our own time, though we have passed from the demonism, there is a lingering tendency to set down those who go exploring beyond the bounds of knowledge as madmen. Almost any one can find instances, but we are content to mention one which has connexion with our present subject. At the close of a lecture by M. Dumas, the well-known French chemist, a lady came to him in the lecture-room; she had a question of great moment to ask him. "Did he think it possible that the pictures seen in a camera could be caught and made permanent?" she was anxious to know what he, a man of science, thought on the subject Her husband had been seized by the idea that he could fix these pictures, day and night he was haunted by the thought; she feared he might be mad. But if a philosopher like M Dumas thought there was any probability in the notion, it would give her the belief that her husband might still be in his senses Dumas assured her that, though he saw no way to fix the pictures, enough was known to prevent him from saying it was impossible and to make it matter worthy of enquiry. The lady's husband was Daguerre, the painter; and some ten years after this conversation with Dumas, he had solved his problem and taught the world how to make the sun itself fix as pictures everything it shone upon; and this discovery has now enabled us more completely to solve, not merely to the understanding, but to the actual sight of every one the problem so long the puzzle of philosophers—the use of our two eyes, and how it comes that seeing with two eyes we still see but one of each object The discovery, however, does more than clear up the scientific difficulty, it opens up a new field of entertainment and instruction, to which our Engravings will serve to introduce our readers. But first a word as to the discovery itself.

BUSTS, SHEWING THE TRIPLING DIFFERENCE IN PERSPECTIVE NECESSARY TO PRODUCE SOLIDITY.

FIRST NOTICE OF THE STEREOSCOPE.

On the 21st of June, 1838, Professor Wheatstone read a paper at the Royal Society "on some previously unobserved phenomena of binocular vision" (sight with two eyes); in the course of which, he described an instrument invented by himself, by which two perspective diagrams of the same solid were seen at one view as completely solid as the object itself.

In 1838 Mr Wheatstone brought his discovery before the British Association, at Newcastle, where it gave rise to a discussion of great interest, in which Sir D Brewster and Whewell took part, and Sir John Herschel characterised the discovery "as one of the most curious and beautiful for its simplicity in the entire range of experimental optics"

In Germany the subject excited still more interest; it was at once eagerly taken up. The new light thrown upon the subject of double vision engaged the most able physiologists and metaphysicians—Brucke, Volkman, Morer, Tourtual, and in Geneva, M. Prevost wrote upon the subject.

In the commencement of 1839, the photographic art, upon which Nepoé, Talbot, and Daguerre had long been at work, was announced; and Mr. Talbot and Mr. Collen, in the same year, at Mr. Wheatstone's request, prepared photographs of full-sized statues, buildings, and portraits, for the Stereoscope.

Mr. Wheatstone's diagrams were proof that small drawings may be made to represent under the stereoscope the complete effect of reality. Two miniatures might be painted, each with one eye, if the artist could attain sufficient accuracy, which, seen by the stereoscope, would be seen as one, and round as life.

But these were only illustrations of an important addition to science. A new step was gained in explanation of the phenomenon of sight It was clear that the inner eye (if we may use the phrase) was furnished with two outer eyes, not merely for the uniformity of the face, nor to puzzle philosophers, but to present an instantaneous perfect vision of the form and position of objects. The one eye, in fact, seeing round one side, the other eye round the other side, and the inner eye having thus brought before it in one and in full solidity the whole object ing; and it is, on many accounts, the most convenient form, as it allows of every adjustment, and can show pictures of any size. But, for small Daguerréotypes, the refracting or prismatic Stereoscope (also constructed by Mr. Wheatstone,) is better adapted. Several ingenious modifications of the instrument have been made by Professor Dove and Sir David Brewster. The latter, which is most generally in use, as made by M. Soleil, of Paris, has the appearance of a double opera-glass; and the modification consists in the substitution of quarter lenses for the prisms employed by Mr. Wheatstone; the eye-glasses refract, or, in other words, throw the images out of the direct line to the centre between the eyes, and each image being in this way removed in a direction towards each other combine, and thus produce the effect of solidity.

The form of the Stereoscope, as originally produced by Professor Wheatstone, and which he called the reflecting Stereoscope, is shown in our Engravings and some ten years after this conversation with Dumas, he had solved his problem and taught the world how to make the sun itself fix as pictures everything it shone upon; and this discovery has now enabled us more completely to solve, not merely to the understanding, but to the actual sight of every one the problem so long the puzzle of philosophers—the use of our two eyes, and how it comes that seeing with two eyes we still see but one of each object The discovery, however, does more than clear up the scientific difficulty, it opens up a new field of entertainment and instruction, to which our Engravings will serve to introduce our readers. But first a word as to the discovery itself.

A reflecting Stereoscope may be readily constructed from our Illustration; and, as a philosophical toy, will afford perhaps, more amusement, and certainly excite more astonishment than the well-known kaleidoscope. It simply consists of two pieces of plate glass, two or three inches square, at right angles to each other. The objects, or designs, are fixed on at each extremity of the instrument, at a distance of two or three inches from the reflecting mirrors, care being taken to place each design in its proper position. In our Illustrations the designs are engraved to be looked at by crossing the vision, or squinting; in using them with the Stereoscope their positions must be reversed. Mr. Holmes, the popular lecturer on science, &c., to whom we are indebted for this series of perspective drawings, is preparing a cheap portable Stereoscope, which will bring the appreciation of this beautiful discovery within the range of all classes.

DAGUERREOTYPES FOR BOTH EYES.

But so long as mere drawings by hand were used, it might be held that the effect, however wonderful, was but some trick of art, by which the senses were cheated. But the Daguerréotype admits of no trick; the silvered plate has neither line, nor light, nor shade, but such as the sun gives it: the two plates in the two cameras stand truly for the two eyes, and receive each just such picture, no more, no less, as each eye receives. There is, therefore, no further room for doubt as to the need for two eyes; we have taken by the Daguerréotype the very picture from each, and have made them tell their secret. Our double vision is but perfect vision.

HOW ONE-EYED PEOPLE OBSERVE SOLIDITY.

But here there is need to answer an objection. It will be said that persons with one eye nevertheless see distinctly, and see perspective and roundness. They do so; and there is neither difficulty in the answer nor any refutation in the fact of what we have said as to double vision. One eye alone, judges of relief of an object, from the accustomed distributions of light and shade, giving perspective appearances, though the perceptions it hence acquires are less vivid than those obtained by means of two eyes. Another curious fact is, that a one-eyed person when looking at a solid object is constantly changing the position of the head from side to side: the result of this is, that he is by this means getting the same effect with one eye that is produced by two eyes with the head stationary. With two eyes, as we have before stated, two images from different points of sight are combined to produce solidity: with one eye, and a constant change of its position, two images in like manner are produced; but the combination depends on the curious circumstance of the second impinging on falling on the retina before the previous impression has escaped. The retention of objects on the retina for some time after their removal is a common fact, and known by most persons. A one-eyed person, with the Stereoscope, by first looking through one side and then through the other, gets the effect of distance and solidity simply, as we have explained, by the retention of the first picture on the retina.

PICTURES AND DIAGRAMS TO BE SEEN SOLID WITHOUT THE STEREOSCOPE.

The Engravings of the last show the small difference in perspective necessary to produce the effect of solidity. They are fac-similes of a pair of photographic pictures, by Claudet, which, seen through the Stereoscope, have in every respect the appearance of the or ginal bust.

Our diagrams of several forms of crystals and geometric solids are illustrations which may be observed without any instrument, to the no small amusement of those who for the first time see them, and may be multiplied in almost infinite variety. These diagrams are constructed to represent what may be termed right and left-eye views of objects, as we should actually see them with the left or right eye alternately. Thus, for example, the railway tunnels, at page 81, present three pictures will present themselves, the central one being a combination of the other two, and producing the effect of a perfectly hollow tunnel; in like manner the other diagrams will combine to form an apparently perfect solid body, presenting all the appearance of a newly-cut crystal apart from the paper. In this case, what is done by the aid of Mr. Wheatstone's instrument, is simply effected by crossing the vision, or squinting. It greatly facilitates the squinting to place the point of a needle held in the hand before the picture, and whilst the eyes continue to regard this point, yet to move it towards the eyes until the pictures coalesce, when three images will be seen, and the middle one, which is the only one seen at once by the two eyes, will have the solid appearance we have described. Some little inconvenience may be experienced at first in squinting with the curious and remarkable phenomenon, but a little patience and perseverance will overcome the difficulty, and will be well rewarded by the result. Our artistic and scientific readers, when they clearly understand the theory of this beautiful discovery, will be enabled to produce many variations of subjects for the regular bodies, as that is requisite is to make one drawing, and simply take a reversed transfer. On using any of the drawings we have given, or copies of them for the reflecting instrument, the left design must be placed in the right, and the right design at the left end. The idea of solidity is evidently produced by the combination of two pictures of a solid body taken from either eye, as from two different points of sight. The perception of distance or perspective Mr. Wheatstone attributes to the same cause; which explains the fact that all paintings and drawings are, in reality, but pictures for one eye, and are seen most like reality when they are looked at with one eye only. We may have distance, dimness, difference of light and shade, but cannot have real roundness and space between and beyond objects, unless each eye has its picture. As it is, our paintings may be said to be a one-sided or one-eyed perspective—the whole landscape or portrait as it would appear to the two eyes is not shown.

PERSPECTIVE IN THE STEREOSCOPE.—CLAUDET'S VIEWS OF THE EXHIBITION, AND STAIUETTE PORTRAIT GROUPS,

But one point further needs explanation as to the stereoscope pictures. They show not only solidity in single objects, but in perspective: M. Claudet has a number of views of the interior of the Exhibition, and though but about 2½ inches square, the whole is, every column, girder, and article exhibited, can be seen standing out in its place, and with all perfect solidity and distinctness as the very Crystal Palace and things themselves. Every piece of sculpture is there as sculpture: the tree standing out and above the gardens beyond, between every branch and leaf; it seems no picture, but a model beyond belief for its wonderful accuracy and comprehensiveness of detail. But it will be said that our explanation cannot be true as to distant objects, for that with them both eyes really view the same picture, and yet the views of the Exhibition seen in the Stereoscope have the distant objects in as full roundness and relief as those at hand. They have, and the reason is, that in the instance the Daguerréotype shows us a view as if the pictures were taken from a small model on the building brought sufficiently near for the whole the distance influenced by the angle of the eyes. In fact, instead of seeing the object itself, you see a miniature model of it brought close to the eyes; so that, in this instance, the stereoscopic Daguerréotypes actually surpass the reality. No one has ever seen the interior of the Exhibition from end to end with such clearness as it is seen in M. Claudet's pictures.

The complete outstanding perspective of distant portions of the picture in the Stereoscope is not perceived to perfection until it has been looked at for some seconds, and then the whole building brought sufficiently full roundness and solidity at once. This arises from the instrument not being perfectly adjusted to the eyes of the observer, whilst it requires for instantaneous perfect vision a different adjustment for different persons. On attentive observation it may also be noted that the near and distant objects do not appear single at the same instant. This arises from the fact that whilst the near objects are seen by each eye at a certain angle, and so that the two pictures form one, the distant objects, with eyes placed at the same angle, are more or less separated, and so are seen more or less distinctly as two pictures. To correct this the eyes alter their distance from each other, and it is only when they have done so with accuracy, that the distant portions of the picture are brought to coincide, that the roundness of the farthest portions is seen as distinctly as of the nearest. This process of adjustment of their two pictures, both as to real objects and their Daguerréotypes, the eyes are incessantly at work upon.

But these stereoscope pictures are not only curious, they are beautiful and useful. We may have in future galleries of portraits no fictions of painters, but the people as they were—not flat and framed, and hung along the walls, nor in cold marble, but round and real as they looked in life: and so with buildings and scenery, we may have, in a cheap rate, our hall of antiquities—Pompeii as it is, Nineveh as Layard sees it—scenery in foreign lands, in our own, in all the minuteness, grandeur, and beauty of nature. Neither Claude nor Turner could have given any more than half such physical or aerial perspective. The artist may carry in his Stereoscope the memorial works of the genius-inspiring masters of every age and country, and wherever the highest living beauty is to be found he may have in an instant his models, subject to no errors of his pencil, but in all the full rich roundness of reality

Nor is it alone interiors and landscapes and studies that are so admirable; we have seen groups of portraits by Mons. Claudet—in one as many as six full-length figures, the distinctness and roundness of which is so life-like as to be almost startling; and so instantaneous is the process by which the pictures are taken, that there is scarcely a limit to the number of portraits that may be given in a single group; even a number of children, difficult as it is to get them to sit steady, may be taken at once; and, indeed, to have the wonderful effect of the stereoscope, groups are best

PROFESSOR WHEATSTONE'S NEW DISCOVERY, THE PSEUDOSCOPE

But we have not yet seen the wonders of binocular or two-eyed vision. On Tuesday, the week instant, Professor Wheatstone read a second paper at the Royal Society, and exhibited an instrument which he calls a pseudoscope, on account of it giving false perceptions of all external objects. Some of the illusions were very extraordinary. Its effect may be briefly expressed as making whatever point is nearest seem farthest off, and vice versâ; so that all objects seen through it seem as if they were turned inside out. A solid terrestrial globe is seen concave, like Wyld's globe, with the map on the inside. The inside of a teacup appears a rounded projecting solid. A china vase, with embossed coloured flowers, appears as if it were cut in two: and we saw the side with the flowers indented. A bust shows as a deep hollow mask. A framed picture hanging against the wall seems as if it were let into the wall; and in general objects placed before a wall are seen behind it, as if the wall existed no longer. Many other combinations, and in some cases perplexing, illusions are produced by the instrument, which is very portable, and will, no doubt, soon be to be had of every optician, as, from the infinity of its illusions, it is sure, even as a toy, to become popular.

Those who wish to follow further the curious subject of binocular vision, especially as regards its theory, we must refer to Professor Wheatstone's papers in the Philosophical Transactions, to Whewell's "Philosophy of the Inductive Sciences," and several papers by Sir David Brewster, to be found in the Philosophical Magazine, and to Mr. Claudet's collection of Stereoscopic Daguerréotypes, which will enable them better than any description to appreciate this new contribution to science and art.

COUNTRY NEWS.

REFORM.

On Tuesday evening a crowded meeting of the Council of the Manchester Financial and Parliamentary Reform Association was held at Manchester; Mr. Wilson in the chair. Amongst the gentlemen present were Mr. Bright, M.P., Mr. Gibson, M.P., Mr. James Heywood, M.P., Mr. Alexander Henry, M.P., Mr. Walmsley, M.P., Sir Edmund Armitage, M.P., Mr. Hooper, M.P., Mr. Thomas Thompson, Mr. Joseph Sampson, Dr. Joule, Mr. Barratt, Mr. John Platt, Mr. John Moore, Mr. N. Buckley, Mr. John Whittaker.

On the motion of Mr. Bright, M.P., the following resolution was agreed to:—

"That the population of the country of Lancaster, by the census of 1851, is declared to be upwards of 2,300,000, or one-eighth of the population of England and one-fourteenth of that of the United Kingdom, that its taxable property, by a Parliamentary return dated in 1842, is declared to be £63,000,000, or more than one-tenth of the whole rateable property of England; that its contributions to the national exchequer, whether from customs contributions, or from payments to the revenue, from income tax, or excise duties, far exceed the average of the population and area of the United Kingdom, that its position with regard to industry, wealth, intelligence, and population, is second to no other county of the United Kingdom; that on all these grounds this county is entitled, in any measure of Parliamentary reform that is introduced by the Government or enacted by the Legislature, to a number of members at least equal to that to which it would be entitled by its population, wealth, intelligence, and the industry of the United Kingdom; and in this view they adopt the following petitions, in the hope that they may receive the consideration of your honourable House, and be accepted in any measure for the amendment of the representation:—

"Your petitioners propose, that the elective franchise shall henceforth be based upon occupation, and that every male person of full age, and not subject to any legal disability, of residence as shall be necessary to afford a guarantee that the occupation is bona fide; and, further, that the 40s. franchise shall be extended to the United Kingdom, and be conferred upon the possessors of property of that amount value, whether derived from freehold, copyhold, or leasehold tenures.

"Your petitioners are of opinion that your honourable House cannot satisfactorily adjust the representation of the people without a very considerable change in the distribution of the several lower and middle classes, that, while practicable and convenient, an all and ne gle-bouring borough s shall be united and form one borough; that, where such union is not practicable, small boroughs shall cease to return members, and their population be merged in the county in which they are situate; that, corresponding to the extent to which small boroughs shall be united, or shall cease to return members to Parliament, the borough shall be transferred from the populous towns now unrepresented, and that additional members shall be conferred upon the metropolitan and other first-class boroughs in the United Kingdom, and that, so far as is practicable, no constituency shall contain fewer than 5000 electors

"That your petitioners are most strongly of opinion, that the adoption of the ballot is indispensable to free representation; that it would make the conviction of the elector, rather than his personal interest and fears, the leading motive in the exercise of the franchise; that it would greatly repress the demoralising practices, so disgraceful to our national character, and so degrading to electors, which seem almost inseparable from contests as at present under the existing system; and that it would aid most effectually in preventing the turbulence and riot which have been the disgrace of elections in populous towns.

"That your petitioners are of opinion that the present legal duration of Parliament is much too extended to secure to constituencies a proper control over their representatives, and may, therefore, strongly urge the repeal of the Septennial Act, and the limitation of the duration of Parliaments, according to ancient precedents, to a period not exceeding three years

"That your petitioners, in urging the adoption of the foregoing propositions, express their belief that they are strictly in accordance with the principles and objects of the constitution; that they will provide for an honest expression of public opinion in your honourable House, and are calculated to secure a just and economical government of the British empire. Your petitioners, therefore, earnestly pray that the said propositions may form a part of any measure which your honourable House may pass to amend the representation of the people.

"And your petitioners will ever pray," &c.

GREYHOUND SALE.—Mr. Webb's, of Worcester, celebrated kennel of greyhounds came to the hammer at Tattersall's on Monday last. The 26 lots produced 643 guineas, as follows:—Bitch and puppies—Fly, 7 gs.; Water Sprite, 12 gs.; Wreaker, 36 gs.; Well-bred-ver, 31 gs.; Wicked Boy—Vixen, 45 gs.

SUSPECTED SMUGGLING AT SOUTHAMPTON.—In consequence of information having been received by the Commissioners of Customs of extensive transactions being carried on by officers of the steamers employed to and from the French ports and the southern coast of England, an active and experienced metropolitan officer has been employed to visit the English ports in question for the purpose of detecting the contraband practices. The whole of the officers of the Southampton and Havre passage steamers underwent a rigid examination a few days since, immediately on their arrival at the first-mentioned port, by the metropolitan officers, who, however, failed to detect anything illegal. The officers were partially stripped. But a rigid personal examination has never before been found necessary at Southampton.

The complete nucleus of telegraphic lines has now been laid down (says a Munich letter of the 12th inst.), so that by means of the submarine telegraph we may send a message to London and receive an answer in half an hour. The charge is 25 florins.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

A Cabinet Council was held on Thursday at the Foreign Office, at two o'clock. The Ministers present were Lord John Russell, the Lord Chancellor, Sir Charles Wood, the Earl of Minto, Sir G. Grey, Lord Broughton, Earl Grey, Right Hon. Sir T. F. Baring, Right Hon. M. Labouchere, the Earl of Carlisle, Earl Granville, Lord Seymour, the Marquis of Clanricarde, and the Right Hon. Fox Maule.

THE NEW REFORM BILL.—"We are told by writers," says a Morning paper, "who ought to know, or at least to say, we ought to know that what passes within the Cabinet can be known to none without . . . at grave discussions have arisen upon the proposed Reform Bill, of the extremest. This has no more need of contradiction than the ceiling to mind the economy that such discussions in opinion as the subject selected would be followed by immediate resignation. Besides this, it is known beyond the Cabinet for some days, and that the deform Bill is already agreed upon, and its details in active preparation, with a view to its being presented to Parliament at the very commencement of the session.

THE NEW HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT.—Orders have been issued from the Lord Great Chamberlain's office, that the Victoria entrance to the new two sets of Parliament, in Abingdon-street, is to be prepared for the reception of the Queen at the approaching opening of the session of Parliament. Her Majesty having expressed her intention to pass beneath that gigantic archway into the House of Lords. The new House of Commons is now ready for the reception of members. Great preparations are being made to bring the state apartments of the Speaker to a finish, in order that the right hon. gentleman may be enabled to give his Parliamentary dinners and hold his levees there. The entire river front of both Houses is now nightly illuminated with rows of gas-burners.

THE MINT.—The Lords of the Treasury have sanctioned the new arrangements made by Sir John Pirie, recently deceased, for the death of Mr. Wyon and two recent additions in the constitution of the establishment as regards the engravers and die-sinkers. Mr. Pistrucci is to have £400 a year, and Mr. Leonard Wyon (son of the late chief engraver) Mr. Joseph Pistrucci, and Mr. Wyon are to be called "Modellers and Engravers to her Majesty's Mint," and the grants thus awarded them are to be considered as recognitions of their services and compensation for other offices. The two moderators are not to reside in the Mint, but are to have additional pay for any work they may execute at the request of the Master. Their successors as "Modellers and Engravers" will have a fixed allowance, but will be paid for the making of matrices only. The common clerk will now be executed by a resident engraver, under the direction of the Superintendent of the Die Department, and Mr. James Wyon has been nominated, it is said, to the appointment.

CHARING-CROSS HOSPITAL.—The committee of this admirable charity have just presented the annual statement of the operations of the hospital for the past year. In the course of the last year 17,995 indigent sick persons were admitted on the books for relief, at a cost of £2450 11s. 9½d.; of these, 1200 were in-patients, and 16,795 were out-patients (many of whom were visited at their own homes, and the greater part were restored to the blessings of health and to their occupations for the support of their families). There, with the cases reported in former annual statements, make a total of 204,858 sick and needy individuals who have partaken of the advantages of the institution, from its commencement in 1818, to the 31st December, 1851. In their last statement the committee furnished a detail of the cases of accident and sudden injuries brought to the hospital in the preceding year. These cases have, during the last year, amounted to 2238; of which 1850 were so dangerous as to require to be treated as in-patients. The report concludes with a special appeal for the completion of the Charing-cross Hospital.

CITY DISPENSARY.—The annual meeting was held on Wednesday, at the Dispensary, Aldersgate-street, City. Mr. N. Alger in the chair. The report stated that the number of patients admitted during the year was 9787, which, to bear with 997 patients under treatment on the 1st of January, made a total of 10,784. Of these, 9648 had been cured or relieved; 544 had died; 32 had been discharged for irregularity; and there were 1059 now remaining under treatment. The statement of accounts showed that there was a balance against the Committee of £240 11 10½.

GENERAL LYING-IN HOSPITAL.—The annual meeting was held on Monday, at the Hospital, York-road, Lambeth; Mr. F. S. Cobbs, M.P., in the chair. The report stated that, during the past year, 248 patients had been added to the list of hospital, and 240 attended at their own homes. The receipts amounted to £1659 8s. 7d., and the expenses to £1678 19s. 3d., leaving a balance of £340 9s. 4d. There had been a decrease in the house expenses during the last year of nearly £200, owing to some alteration in the management.

METROPOLITAN CONVALESCENT INSTITUTION.—The annual meeting was held at the offices, 32, Southampton-street, Covent-garden; Murray in the chair. In a report it was stated that, from the absence of a sufficient means of classification in their present confined building, it was found impossible to admit children 14 years of age, or those afflicted with chronic cases. To remedy this it had been resolved to erect a new hospital on a piece of ground generously presented by the Earl of Ellesmere. Her Majesty the Queen, for the purpose of securing to his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, for his life, the right of having at all times one patient in the institution, had, through Colonel Phipps, forwarded 250 guineas. A gentleman, under an assumed name, had sent £7 0s. to the credit of the institution at one of the City banks, and the late Mr. G. Harriman had bequeathed £500. Of the patients admitted during the past year, 243 had been cured, 243 greatly relieved, 1 woman had died, and 12 remained. The receipts for the year amounted to £1177 4s. 3d., and the expenditure to £1102 18s. 7d.

SAINT LUKE'S HOSPITAL FOR THE INSANE, OLD-STREET-ROAD.—At a special meeting, last Monday, at the London Tavern—the Lord Mayor in the chair, and after the departure Mr. Edmunds—a proposition to alter the rules, in order to be so, that the annual subscription to the hospital should be 50 guineas for boys and 15 for girls, instead of 10 guineas, as before, was carried, and ten chaplains were elected. The admissions, irrespective of vacancies, will be upon a graduated scale of payment, beginning with £50 for 5 years old, and ending at £10 for 14 years old. Her Majesty has become a patron to the institution, and the Prince of Wales, by his gift of 250 guineas, has been constituted a governor, with a presentation for life.

ROYAL NAVAL BENEVOLENT SOCIETY.—The annual meeting was held on Monday, at the Thatched House Tavern; Rear-Admiral Lord Radstock in the chair. The financial statement was read. It showed that the receipts of the last year amounted to £3140 11s. 2d., and the expenditure to £2218 10s. 1d., leaving a balance of £922 1s. 1d.

BRITISH ORPHAN ASYLUM.—The usual half yearly meeting of this charity was held in the London Tavern on Monday, for the purpose of electing seven children from a list of twenty-eight candidates. The report, which was highly satisfactory, stated that the number of children under training in the course of the year was ninety-seven, and the committee have much pleasure in stating that they have now placed the education of the whole upon an improved footing. The total receipts had been £4053 9s. 9d., and there was left a balance in hand of £242 19s. 9d.

GENERAL BENEVOLENT ASSOCIATION.—The annual meeting of this association was held on Monday evening at the London Tavern; Dr. W. J. Little in the chair. The report stated that the new rule adopted by the subscribers, by which the committee were empowered to dispose of nine-tenths instead of seven-tenths of the annual subscriptions, in exercising cases submitted to the Association, and that their power to give assistance in a greater number of cases of a most deserving character. Forty-five cases of distress had been relieved during the year, at a cost of £1 per week, and £1 per week annuitised to £156 3s. 8d., and the amount of relief given to £86 8s., leaving a balance of £103

THE EARLY CLOSING ASSOCIATION.—With a view to relieve this society of an old-standing debt amounting to nearly £300 Mr. Hitchcock, the silversmith, of St. Paul's Churchyard, recently stated that he would double any sum that should be collected for the purpose during the month that date (15th Nov. last). Encouraged by the munificence of this proposal, the members at once commenced a vigorous canvass, which resulted in their raising within the period specified £626 1s. 8d., in sums varying from one guinea to one shilling, and thus the generous donor would be called on to pay £313 0s. 10d., leaving a balance of £313 0s. 10d. to be collected.

LONDON LIFE ASSOCIATION.—At the half-yearly meeting, on Wednesday, at which Mr. Hutchinson presided, it was stated in the report, were £2714,049, and the payments £206,364, leaving a balance of £7064 15s 4d.

PROVIDENT CLERKS' ASSOCIATION.—At the eleventh annual general meeting, last Monday night, at the London Tavern, the two reports of the benefit, or life assurance branch, and of the benevolent branch were received; the balance in the former was £9,677 3s. 1d. In the benevolent department the sum received since that on the 24th of May last two clerks should be elected within the age of 25 each, and two others between the ages of 25 and 30 each, and should there be an application for clerks, the numbers of widows shall not be increased. During the last year grants the amounting to £110 had been presented to clerks and widows to the amount of £93 5s., leaving a balance of £16, being a decrease of £360 on the amount in 1850, and showing the improved condition of the clerks belonging to the society. Five clerks and 14 widows were receiving their annuities.

THE PROVIDENT CLERKS' MUTUAL LIFE ASSURANCE ASSOCIATION AND BENEVOLENT FUND.—The annual meeting of this association was held on Monday evening, at the London Tavern, Mr. Hall in the chair. From the balance sheet that the receipts for the year amounted to £5,506 and the expenses to £5629, leaving a balance of £1677. The assets are set down at £28,585, and the liabilities at £1,477. The report stated that the income for the year to £1,506, after deducting the sum of £3,0,0, had been granted during the year. One clerk has been granted an annuity of £25, and two widows £5 each. The balance sheet gave the receipts £13,7 11s., and the expenditure £703 leaving a balance for 1851.

NEW SOUP KITCHEN.—At a meeting which took place at the London Tavern, on the 15th instant, the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor in the chair—as appears was made to the citizens of London for the establishment of City brai ches of the Leicester-square Soup Kitchen and Hospice, for contributions of such articles as might be useful in the kitchens, lavatories, &c., attached thereto. Messrs. Gibbs, of the City Soup Works, Milton-street, Cripplegate, have forwarded to the committee, as their donation, 5 cwt of soap, for the use of the lavatories of such institutions; and it is expected that his example will be followed by other tradesmen, by which the expense necessarily attendant on the formation of such an establishment materially lessened.

SOCIETY OF ARTS.—Mr. Wentworth C. Dilke presided at Wednesday's meeting. Professor Solly delivered a lecture "On the nature of vegetable substances used in manufactures," being the sixth lecture on subjects connected with the Great Exhibition. The lecturer observed that it was necessary to call these vegetable substances raw materials, whereas many of the articles exhibited under this denomination have undergone many operations preparatory to their introduction to this country for manufacturing purposes. There was not in each case a single specific explanatory of the entire sources from which any particular raw taxtile material can be procured. Where the producer of the raw material and the manufacturer are more or less in direct communication, it might be taken as a pretty correct rule that the greatest improvements had taken place. He referred to resin of the Xanthorrea, now beginning to be used largely in the place of shellac, for making black sealing-wax. Oil of cinnamon and oil of cassia were nearly made in Java, as were also cinnamon and others; to the great changes in the manufacture of starch, by means of chemical agencies; to caoutchouc, to the introduction of ulva pertha, for which the large gold medal was awarded, and which was a very valuable article for the arts and for other purposes. The oils of the Eucalyptus piperita and stringerniana, from New South Wales, which yielded valuable resins, were also of great use. He entered into the art of dyeing, specifically in the vegetable raw materials employed, showing the great improvement in modern times. True chemical science might be applied to great advantage to increase the proportion of colouring matter per cent. Cotton, flax, hemp, &c. next came under notice. He looked to India for a large supply of cotton, China grass, and silk cultivation. Large importations of woods for shoe-binding were dwelt upon. Fine samples of the wood of various species of Eucalyptus were continued from Western Australia. One of the trees, 14 feet in diameter was cut down on purpose, and a blank of that width would have been sent to the Exhibition, but, owing to the want of saws of sufficient magnitude to cut it up, it was found impossible to forward it.

UNION BANK OF AUSTRALIA.—At Monday's special meeting, at the offices in Old Broad-street, the report declared that there was a general improvement in the business of all branches during the last half-year. The directors had taken steps to meet the new state of affairs in New South Wales by the recent discoveries. The prospects of Van Diemen's Land and of the New Zealand lands were decidedly improving, and are likely to be permanent by promoted by the Australian gold discoveries. The usual dividend, at the rate of 6 per cent, per annum on the entire paid-up capital of the bank, was declared, together with a bonus of 10s. per share on the 20,000 paid-up shares, and a like proportion of bonus on the £2 10s. per share paid up on the 8000 shares of the third series, payable in London on the 1st of February, and on Tuesday, Feb. 3d, and in the colonies, with the addition of seventpence in the pound, as soon as the inspector shall fix after the receipt of advices. A vote of thanks to the widow of the late Mr. Oxsden, the director in Launceston, was carried.

NATIONAL PARLIAMENTARY AND FINANCIAL REFORM ASSOCIATION.—A public meeting took place at the Prince Albert, Islington, on Tuesday, at which resolutions approving of the principles of the association were carried, and a petition to be presented to Parliament by Mr. Wakley, M.P., for vote by ballot, extension of the franchise, re-arrangement of electoral districts, &c., was adopted.

THE MARYLEBONE PARLIAMENTARY AND FINANCIAL REFORM ASSOCIATION.—A public meeting was held at the British Stores, New-street, Portland-town, on Thursday evening—Mr. T. K. Richard in the chair—at which resolutions were passed, that, in order to ensure an excellent and complete reform of the House of Commons, it was indispensable that all parties should express their opinions with energy and determination, so that the representations of her Majesty's Ministers may be made aware of the sentiment and wishes of the people, and that any measure of reform which did not include the principles put forth by the National Reform Association would not deserve the confidence and support of the people.

THE PRINCESS' DRAMATIC SOCIETY.—The second New Year's soiree of the Princess' Dramatic Society was held on Saturday evening, at Anderson's Hotel, Fleet-street. We have already, on a previous occasion, had a word or two of laudatory notice not only on account of the praiseworthy object they have in view, but because of the amount of bona fide merit which many of its amateurs display.

METROPOLITAN COMMISSION OF SEWERS.—At the special court, held in Greek-street, on Wednesday, a letter of Mr. Frank Forster, the engineer, dated the 14th instant, resigning his office, gave rise to considerable discussion. Mr. Forster explained, in the determined opposition of one of the commissioners, Captain Vetch, R.E.; of the dismissal of his best and most efficient assistants; of the ill-credit thrown on his works exeeuted as proposed; and concluded by stating that as he was no longer allowed to carry out his plans scientifically continue his duties. Captain Vetch discussed any persons feeling against Mr. Forster. Major Dawson moved, and Sir John Burgoyne seconded, that Mr. Forster's resignation be accepted. Mr. Shaw Lefevre moved, and Mr. Alsagar seconded, an amendment, that the resignation be not accepted until Mr. Forster had the opportunity of giving an explanation of his letter in full court, which was unanimously agreed to, the chairman's casting vote being in favour of the amendment uncollected was £53,507 6s. 2½d., or, exclusive of the new rates, £31,936 18s. 8d.

CITY SEWERS COMMISSION.—From the reports presented on Tuesday, at Guildhall, it appears that the city is orderly system is working well. A letter was read from Mr Hodgson, clerk to the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's, again declining to meet the commissioners until the st. rooches to Ludgate-hill had been completed, their right to remove the rubbish from which the Dean and Chapter area, according to the recent act of Parliament, as the provision was merely permissive, at the discretion of the Dean and Chapter. After some discussion, Mr. Haywood, the surveyor, was directed to seek a conference with the cathedral authorities on the subject of his plan.

FIRES.—On Sunday morning, between seven and eight o'clock, the premises occupied by the Old Woolwich Steam-packet Company, in Cobe-aune, Woolwich, were discovered to be on fire. The premises of Mr. Sarke, a baker, Berwick-street, Soho, and Mr. Gwynn, cheesemonger, Hackney-road, were also destroyed by fire on Sunday morning.—On Monday night, shortly before nine o'clock, a fire broke out on the premises of Mr. William Brown, No. 4, Tyrrel's-court, Chancery-lane, in the first floor. Mr. Wilkinson, the head engineer of the station, and Daly, one of the firemen, notwithstanding the density of the smoke, rushed into the apartment, groped through the fire and smoke, and at great risk succeeded in saving the life of a young child.—On Tuesday night, shortly after nine o'clock, a fire, attended with considerable destruction of property, broke out in the extensive range of premises belonging to Mr. Allen, a dairyman, in the New Cut, Lambeth. The inmates of the house and yard were not out of the b. lieving alive, and it is generally understood that all the fire stock was saved.—On Tuesday morning, at an early hour, a fire broke out in the premises belonging to Messrs. Hutchinson and Co., oilmen, &c., in Bell-yard, Temple, Bristol-st. Mr. Clarke, being confined by paralysis, was unable to make the least effort to save himself, and had in not been for the exertions of his friends in the house he must inevitably have perished in the flames.—On Wednesday morning, about two o'clock, a serious fire broke out at Old Ford, near Bow Church, on the premises known as the Wick Lane Saw-mills, the property of Messrs. Lucas and Co., which, about 10 feet wide, and from 50 to 60 feet high, and were in the tenure of Mr. James Allen, paper-stainer. The firemen at last succeeded in getting the master over the building, but not until he had received very severe injuries. The mills were a two storied building, with a tile roof, and the contents of both floors were insured in the Alliance Fire Office.—On Wednesday night the premises of Mr. Bowden, corn-chandler, Portsmouth-street, were burnt down.

BIRTHS AND DEATHS.—Up to Saturday, Jan. 17, the births of 762 boys and 727 girls, in all 1489 children, were registered in London. In seven correspon ding weeks of 1840-51 the average was 1424. The deaths last week were 1044 males, and 858 females, in all 1902. In the ten corresponding weeks of the years 1842-51 the average was 1135, and if this be raised in proportion to the increase of population it becomes 1253, compared with which last week's mortality exhibits a decrease of 157. The registrar-general's returns show a small decline in the deaths from some epidemic diseases, from diseases of the lungs, of the nervous system, and those of the digestive organs; while there is an increase in the molecular class and diseases of the heart. The deaths by violence, mortality from consumption was 198; the week's table 123; bronchitis 60; convulsions 60; from 112 to 109; and pneumonia from 86 to 70. Typhus is about the same, 45; smallpox, 23, of whom 20 were children, four of whom had been vaccinated. In the Royal Hospital, Kew, which, I perceive, has been built by Mr. Dr. Mr. Jan. inmates were the youngest was 10 years of age, and the oldest 89, and the mean of all average 67. In the hospital died in the Greenwich Workhouse, and whose ages averaged nearly 80 years. The death of a boy aged 5 years and 9 months, from the accidental passage of a pea into the larynx, is recorded. Three persons died of intemperance. A monument died of diseased heart and in air in her room in Gerrard-street. The death of a boy, aged 10 years, in the Metropolitan, is ascribed to exertion at school to gain a prize of new clothes. The unusual occurrence of a death from carbonic acid gas in a room in the case of a female servant, aged 34, in Marylebone Workhouse.

METEOROLOGICAL OBSERVATIONS.—At the Royal Observatory, Greenwich, the mean reading of the barometer in the week was 29.467 inches. The mean temperature was 46.8 degrees, which is 9.5 degrees higher than the average of corresponding weeks in ten years. The mean daily temperature was highest than the average on every day of the week. On Sunday and Monday it was above 47 degrees, which is about 11 degrees above the average; on Wednesday it was 47 degrees; on Thursday the mean was 49.6 degrees, the highest in the week, and nearly 13 degrees above the average of the same day; on Friday it was 47.8 degrees; and on Tuesday, and Saturday it was above 42 degrees, or about 5 degrees above the average, on which two days the lowest means of the week occurred. The wind blew generally from the south-west, but on Saturday changed to the north-west. The amount of rain which fell during the week was 1.76 inches.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

SITTINGS IN ERROR.—The following learned judges, namely, Lord Campbell, Lord Chief Justice Jervis, Mr. Baron Alderson, Mr. Baron Parke, Mr. Justice Patteson, and Mr. Baron Martin, assembled in the Exchequer Chamber on Tuesday morning, and proceeded to fix the "return" days after term. The final arrangement was as follows: Errors from the Court of Queen's Bench, Monday, Feb 5, and Tuesday, Feb 6. errors from the Court of Common Pleas, Wednesday, Feb. 4, and Thursday, Feb 5; errors from the Court of Exchequer, Friday, Feb 6, and Saturday, Feb 7. Lord Campbell announced that the Chamber won d continue to sit after the days which had already stated, if it should be found that the work of the business in the Chamber could not be dispatched within the period which their Lordships had specially fix d.

EXAMINATION OF A WIFE AGAINST HER HUSBAND.—In the course of a cause heard in the Court of Chancery on Monday, the Lord Chancellor stated the circumstances under which the difficulties with respect to the question had arisen. When the bill was before the House of Lords, he moved that the clause which gave the courts of law the power of examining the wife be struck out, and it was struck out accordingly. In the body of the bill, and in another clause, there was, however, a power given for the reception of the evidence of the wife in certain cases, and in the trial of criminal offences. That clause by an oversight, and in consequence of the lateness of the hour at which the bill was d scussed, had been permitted to remain; and one of the learned judges, seeing that the evidence was admissible in certain criminal cases, assumed that it was receivable in all, although the general clause had been struck out. That view of the matter was, his Lordship added, not one that was generally adopted.

SIR JOHN PORTE'S HOSPITAL.—Vice-Chancellor Turner gave judgment in this case on Tuesday, and dismissed with costs the petition praying for a reference to the Master to approve a scheme to extend and regulate the charity.

PRELIMINARY CAUSE.—On Wednesday the first of the seven indispositions of Patt, Sir Frederick Thesiger, Mr. Serjeant Shee, Mr. Montague Chambers, Q.C., Mr. E. James, Q.C., Mr Bramwell, Q.C., Mr. Bodkin, Hon. R. Denman, Mr. Serjeant Cassels, Mr. Pemberton Leigh, Q.C., Mr. Walter Kelly, Mr. Walter Riddell, Mr. E. E. Simons, Mr. M. Fortescue, Mr. Lush, Mr. Bovill, Mr. Parry, Mr. W. Payne, Mr. Woolett, Mr. Rocfter, Clarke, and about forty other members of the circuit. Several complimentary toasts were proposed and duly honoured.

MIDDLE TEMPLE.—The following members of this society have been called to the bar, and were sworn in on the 17th inst., in the hall: Mr. Arthur Pearson, Mr. Joseph Pargeter Bellenden Kelly, and Mr. Robert Lee.

GRAY'S INN.—At a pension of the Honourable Society of Gray's Inn, holden on Wednesday, Terence Hughes, Esq., was called to the degree of barrister-at-law.

Last Saturday 400 notices were given in the Queen's Bench of intended applications to be admitted attorneys in that court; 170 will come up for examination this, and the remainder in the ensuing Easter Term.

LAW UNIVERSITY.—The projected scheme for a law university for law is at length under the serious consideration of the authorities. It is not even improbable that the next session of Parliament may witness the production of a measure framed for the accomplishment of this object. A meeting of an educational committee, composed of benchers of the four inns of court, was held in the hall of Lincoln's-inn on Monday afternoon. Nothing has yet transpired as to the extent of educational reform contemplated, or, indeed, to show that the question has yet taken the slightest shape of a bona fide project. It will be a fortunate thing for the friends of this reform to learn that the benchers are at least moving.—Law Times.

REGISTRATION OF DEEDS.—It is, we believe, very doubtful whether this often-defeated measure will be renewed next session. Lord Campbell, it is said, will have nothing more to do with it. He is naturally disgusted at the treatment of the government, in giving him all the labour and anxiety of carrying the bill through the Lords, and then deserting him at the last moment. The spectacle, indeed, of a measure of so great public importance introduced by the Lord Chief Justice of England, with the warm support of the Ministry, and opposed by the Lord Chancellor—with the exhibition of a divided house—was discreditable, and ought not to have been permitted by the Premier. Either the bill should have been openly and honourably abandoned by its supporters in the Cabinet, in deference to the Chancellor, or the Chancellor should have dared from a post which he was unable to occupy in accord with his colleagues.—Law Times.

JUDGES' CLERKS.—Among the recommendations of the Common Law Commissioners which will probably be adopted is one that the judges' clerks shall be paid by salaries instead of fees. In 1847 the fees of the twelve judges' clerks amounted to £232 5s. 6d. It appears that the fees can be undoubtedly commuted to £1,000 per annum. Mr. Justice Coleridge, the Chief Bar's coachman."—The commissioners recommend a revision of the fees.

THE LAW OF SETTLEMENT AND REMOVAL.—A plan proposed by Mr. W. B. West, to abolish the law of settlement and removal, was discussed in St Martin's parish last Tuesday, and a public meeting is shortly to be held to consider the scheme.

The Brussels journals announce the arrival in that city of MM. Alexandre Dumas, Emile de Girardin, Joigneaux, Esquiros, Noel Parfait, Saint-Ferréol, Lucien Dupont, Auby, Theuriet, Cazamajor, and other ex-representatives; and they add, that 400 French Refugees had arrived or passed through Belgium since the 2d December.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS FOR THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

The English Market on Monday opened at a fractional improvement upon the closing prices of the Saturday preceding, the 3 per cent consols opening 96¾ ¾ for the firmly maintaining that price during the day. The steadiness was, however, of short continuance, for on Tuesday the opening price was an eighth lower, and as the day advanced Consols declined to 96⅝ ⅞, afterwards closing at 96⅞ ¾. The French funds quoted lower, and appear to go gradually receding, influencing operations here. Business prevailed on Wednesday. Consols being offered at 96⅞, but the closing price was again 96⅞ ¾. This was followed by a small fall on Thursday, and at the close of the week's transactions a want of confidence in the state of affairs in France pr mpted a tendency to decline. The Unfunded Debt remains at about the last week's prices, the opening 96⅞ ¾ for the firmly maintains a high value. The official closing values of the week were for Bank Stock, 216; Three per Cent. Reduced Annuities, 97; Three per Cent. Consols, 96⅞; Three per Cent. Annuities, 1726, 97; New Three per Cent. Annuities, 97; per Cent., 98; Long Annuities, 1860, 7; Ditto, 30 years, 1859, 6; Ditto, 30 years, 1860, 6; India Stock, 261; Consols for Account, Feb. 10, 96⅞. Exchequer Bills, £26.0, 1d. 98s; £500, ditto, 98s; £1000, ditto, 98s; small, 1d. 98s.

Prices were a trifle firmer on Monday in the Foreign Market, Mexican quoting 30 to ½ for Account; Sardinian, 90¼ 91; Spanish Five per Cents, 23¾; the New Deferred, 18¾ ¾. It appears by a letter from Mr. Wodehouse, that the Spanish holders of stock, at a meeting at Madrid, determined upon loaning certificates for the repudiated coupons, similar to the certificates issued here. This suffices to show that the Spanish capitalists are slave to the disgraceful repudiation of Senor Bravo Murillo. Heaviness prevailed on Tuesday. Mexican declining to 29⅝ ⅞; Sardinian to 90 to ½; Mexican was largely dealt in on Wednesday, but without any ultimate advance in prices, and on Thursday, although a good business was transacted, prices did not vary, neither do the closing values of the week subjoined differ, only any market change in prices. Spanish Bonds, 20¾; Ditto, 5%; Ditto, Passive Certs, 4; Ditto, Deferred Certs, 2¾; Equador, 3¾; Portuguese Five per Cents, 91; ditto, Four per Cents, 84; Spanish Five per Cents, 23¾; ditto, Three per Cents 41¾; ditto, New Deferred, 19; Sardinian, 90¾; Belgian Four per Cents, 101; ditto, Three per Cents, 82¾; Danish Five per Cents, 102¾; Dutch Two-and-a-Half per Cents, 58¾; and the Four per Cent. Certificates, 98¾.

The Railway Market closes heavily, and the Gold Mines Shares are affected by the new gold discoveries in Australia, as well as the diversity of means reported for procuring the gold. Closing quotations are—

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE.—Since our last report the arrivals of English wheat coastwise and by land carriage have been extremely limited, and, in very moderate condition, sold to the prime qualities nearly Monday's quotations, the inferior kinds at a decline of 1s per quarter. Foreign wheat has come forward in fair supply, and the trade ruled heavy at a decline of 1s per quarter. Fine barley realised quite as much money as last week, but have refused to sell. Inferior sorts of both remained rather heavy, but the amount of business doing in that article has been limited. Fine malting fully maintained its value, but inferior sorts ruled very heavy and difficult to sell. WORDS OF THE SONGS.

THE MOTHER'S LAMENT.

[AIR—"How stands the glass around."]

How mournful is my fate!
I've lost my hope, my love, my joy;
My heart is desolate,
And beats but to deplore.
Thy father went before,
And left but thee to bless me, boy;
Thy face was bright as day,
Thy voice like music's sound:
The voice is hushed, the light is quenched,
In the cold, cold ground.

II.

But yet thou sleepest well;
It was a glorious field, my son,
On which thy father fell.
Ah, double grief is mine!
Alike his fate and thine!
'Twas hard such love to yield, my son;
'Twas hard to lose you both,
E'en though your country found;
But flowers are springing from your grave,
In the cold, cold ground.

III.

The cheerful leaves unfold,
As they were looks of thine, my boy,
To bid me be consoled,
And learn to hope and pray.
They seem to smile and say,
"The grave is powerless to destroy."
The sunshine gilds my face;
Love, like the flowers around,
Points smiling up to Heaven, my boy,
From the cold, cold ground.

NOTICE TO QUIT.

[AIR—"As down in the meadows."]

I.

Love plagued me so much when he dwelt in my heart,
That I gave the tormentor a hint to depart;
But he would not obey me: "Oh, why should I go?
You must," he exclaimed, "have a tenant, you know.
And should I forsake you, Ambition, perchance,
Might be the next comer, to lead you a dance;
He'd vex you, perplex you, and lure you astray;
So you'd better be wise, and allow me to stay."

II.

"I care not for Fame or Ambition," I cried;
"I ask but for quiet, and nothing beside."
"All folly!" said Love; "and if Glory should fail,
Some passion less noble your heart would assail.
You must have a tenant to keep the house tight,
And if Glory won't suit you, why Avarice might."
"Enough!" I replied; "let us argue no more!"
And he's tenant again, firmer fixed than before.

NOTES ON THE MELODIES BY SIR H. R. BISHOP.

THE MOTHER'S LAMENT.

MANY songs have been written to the noble and impressive air "HOW STANDS THE GLASS AROUND." The melody bears so strong a resemblance to the tune of "Why, Soldiers, why"—a song popular in the earlier part of the last century—as to render it very probable that the few alterations which it contains were chiefly made to suit the metre and sentiment of the words beginning "How stands the Glass around," commonly known as "General Wolfe's Song," and traditionally said to have been written and sung by him on the night preceding the battle of Quebec. Although originally adapted to words of a bacchanalian character, there is perhaps no air in all English or any other music better calculated than this to convey the expression of the deepest pathos and lamentation.

NOTICE TO QUIT.

"AS DOWN IN THE MEADOWS."—This appears to have been the original title of the present air. More than a century ago it had acquired great popularity, and formed one of the tunes incorporated into several of our ballad operas; among which may be mentioned Gay's Polly (in 1728), a sequel to his Beggar's Opera, but which, on account of the political tendencies and allusions of its predecessor, was forbidden to be represented. Some years ago, however, the opera of Polly was produced at Drury Lane Theatre, for the benefit of Michael Kelly; but notwithstanding the beauty and the pleasing character of many of its melodies, it did not obtain any favour with the public.

LOVERS' QUARRELS.

[Air—"Come, sweet lass."]

I.

LET'S be wise,
And cease repining;
Love is shining
From our eyes:
And taunts no more arise.
After the rain
The sunshine smiles again;
And birds make music rare
When storms have cleared the air.

II.

Love, like flowers,
Blooms all the sweeter
And completer
After showers.
That fill with balm the bowers.
When the wind blows,
The bright flame brighter glows;
And kisses after strife
Make Love the joy of Life.

HAPPY LOVE.

[Air—"Chloe sleeping."]

I.

Tell me, ye waving woods and throbbing ocean,
Ye hills and streams, ye landscapes glowing fair,
Why in my heart ye wake such new emotion?
And ye, O skies, with all your worlds, declare,
What is this secret, deep, untold delight,
Unknown before, that fills me in your sight?

II.

There came an answer to my thought's appealing,
When she I love look'd upward to my face;
Her eyes were fountains bright with new revealing,
The sweet interpreters of nature's grace;
And when she spoke, I press'd her lips impearl'd,
And knew 'twas Love that beautified the world.

THE GREEN LANES OF ENGLAND.

[Air—"Balance a straw."]

I.

THROUGH the green lanes of England, the long summer day,
We wandered at will in our youth's merry May;
We gathered the blooms o'er the hedge-rows that hung,
Or mocked the sweet song that the nightingale sung.
In the autumn we knew
Where the blackberries grew,
And the shy hazel-nuts hidden deep in the shade;
Or with shouting and cheer,
When the Christmas drew near,
In search of the ripe ruddy holly we strayed.

II.

But the green lanes of England, though dear to us then,
Were dearer by far when we grew to be men;
When the heart's first emotions were fervent and pure,
And the world had no grief that a smile could not cure.
'Twas beneath the green leaves,
In the calm summer eves,
That we breathed the young hopes in our bosoms that burned;
Or in love's gentle eyes
Read the tender replies,
That shewed the fond passion as fondly returned.

III.

Ye green lanes of England, wherever we roam,
Ye are linked in our hearts with the memories of home,
With the sports of our childhood, the love of our prime,
And the pensive delights of a soberer time.
Other lands may be fair,
With their balm-breathing air,
And their beauties and grandeurs that charm or appal;
But to young and to old,
Till our hearts shall grow cold,
Shall the green lanes of England be dearer than all.

LOVERS' QUARRELS.

"GREENWICH PARK," OR "COME, SWEET LASS."—A popular tune, to which Gay, in 1720, adapted some words for the Beggar's Opera. D'Urfey's earlier song, beginning "Come, sweet Lass," and written to the same tune, has a still more inviting title, namely, "Slighted Jocky, or Coy Moggy's unspeakable Cruelty." In Playford's Dancing Master, 1698, the name given to this tune is "Greenwich Park." The melody is of that sprightly character, free from vulgarity, of which English National Music affords so many illustrations.

HAPPY LOVE.

"CHLOE SLEEPING."—A delightful air by Dr. Arne, published in the collection of songs entitled Lyric Harmony; a work containing several other excellent productions for which we are indebted to the genius of that composer, such as, "Where the Bee sucks," "To fair Fidele's grassy Tomb," "Gentle Youth," &c. The present air, "Chloe sleeping," is probably altogether unknown to the public in the present day—a mystery the solution of which must be sought for in causes that by no means imply any want of merit in the composition.

THE GREEN LANES OF ENGLAND.

"BALANCE A STRAW."—This once highly popular English air was used in 1772 as the concluding portion of the "Servant's Medley," in the opera of Love in a Village. It is also in a Collection of Songs printed in 1758, in which it is set to some words beginning "From the man whom I love though my heart I disguise," and is stated to be composed by Mr. Oswald, who was a music-publisher in St. Martin's Churchyard, and composer of many of the favourite songs that were sung at Vauxhall and other public places. Indeed, it does not possess any indication of having been composed earlier than about a century ago, at which period, as we are told, it was adapted to a song written on a celebrated posture-master or balancer, and thereby attained the name of "Balance a Straw." It is also said that this tune has been set to some of the chimes of our country churches. The custom of adapting secular airs as well as those of a religious character to the purpose of church-chimes is probably as old as the time of Charles the Second; that of tuning church-bells to playing sacred airs only is, of course, of a still more distant date. In either case, the custom was, in my opinion, "more honoured in the breach than in the observance;" for even in the case wherein the sacred character of an air might have tended to create a prestige in its favour, that prestige was endangered by the ineffective and discordant manner in which the air was "tolled out" upon the bells; and in the case where, as in the present instance, the air was merely a popular one of a secular character, the prestige which would attach to a church-tune was lost. In effect, this setting tunes to the chimes of church-bells was a desecration either way; on the one hand, a sacred air was destroyed and brought into contempt by the miserable manner of executing it; and on the other, a mere popular jig-tune (for such tunes have been thus employed) was a desecration of the use of an edifice adapted for other associations. In no case, even with all the assistance which modern science may render, can the setting of tunes to the chimes of church-bells be made tolerable: the custom, barbaric in its origin, has wisely dropped into disuse, and it is a matter of wonderment that the Corporation of the City of London, on the building of the new Royal Exchange, should have determined on perpetuating it. As might have been foreseen, however, those chimes are now mute: their uselessness and ineffectiveness may have led to their abolition.

LITERATURE.

STOTHARD; HIS GENIUS AND CAREER.*

INITIAL LETTER (THESE PRESENTS)
For the Policies of the Amicable Insurance Company, 1779.

THE appearance of this handsome volume is one amongst many instances in evidence of an increasing appetite on the part of the public for the amenities of art, and of a corresponding desire on the part of publishers to minister to it. Fifty years ago, a similar volume illustrative of the career and genius of the noblest painter in the annals of time would have been a failure, not because there were not the materials nor the hands for its production, but because there was not a public to purchase a hundred copies of it when produced. Now, thanks to the increased facilities for extensive multiplication of examples afforded by the reproduction of steel plates, and the improved school of wood-engraving, which has followed as a natural consequence of our gigantic resources in printing machinery, the painter and engraver count their thousands and tens of thousands of votaries, where before to reach hundreds was the happy exception; and a large field of public intelligence has been laid under art-cultivation which would otherwise have remained in the darkest ignorance both of the pleasures and uses of pictorial representation.

It is not reasonable, however, to suppose that this art-culture should be the work of a day or of a season: men must be taught what they ought to look for in art, before they will know what to admire; they must learn what has been accomplished by others before they can pretend to fix a standard of excellence applicable to individual performances before them. During this process the majority of art-students must consent to doubt the accuracy of their first impressions, and the art-practitioner to disregard the applause of the multitude, if he do not even go so far as to suspect it as an evidence of failure, or at least of shortcoming of the highest purposes of art, either as regards the subject chosen, or the manner of its treatment.

We are not of those who pretend that no one can judge of works of art except the artist; that it requires practical experience in the manipulation of colours to appreciate the brilliant effects produced by a Titian, a Rubens, or a Rembrandt; or a probationary course in a drawing class to feel the magnificent conceptions of a Michael Angelo, the life-breathing compositions of Raphael and Correggio, or the pregnant epics of our own Hogarth, whom, in spite of the pooh-poohing of certain critics of the Jean Brummel school, we must always consider the greatest painter, and that in the greatest style, of modern times. To deny the right of criticism to all who cannot paint, would be as absurd as to deny the right of judging of the quality of a dinner to the man who cannot cook; and, if the pretence were carried out, it would very speedily reduce the number of patrons of art, culinary and pictorial, to a ruinously low figure. Every man his own cook, and every man his own painter, would then be the rule in a society reduced to primitive barbarism.

But criticism, as well as painting or sculpture, is an art per se; it is the art of judging well, both of the conception and the execution of a work. Based upon correct principles, educated by the contemplation of the best works in sufficient variety, criticism even takes a higher ground than art—executive art—in its general manifestations; for, whilst the artist (with rare exceptions, which only prove the rule) never attempts to grasp and exercise all the resources of his art, the critic should strive to fill the highest judgment-seat, to enrich and strengthen his mind by a ripe study of the highest standards, which having done, all the lower are included as a matter of course.

Looking upon criticism in this light, as the highest school or court of appeal in the republic of arts, we need hardly observe that the duties of the critic assume an importance, and are attended with an amount of responsibility, which cannot be thought lightly of, except by those who have no pretensions to the office. In exercising his functions it should always be borne in mind that the critic has to administer right and justice not only as between artist and artist, candidates in the same field, but as between artists and the public, who are their patrons. An ignorant public will never do justice to the highest merit in art, yet every measure of encouragement bestowed upon mediocrity is done at the expense of what is due to higher merit; and thus it is that tricksters and pretenders flourish and fatten, whilst true genius, unmindful of neglect, undismayed by penury and privation, pursues its way of unrequited toil, looking to posterity for its reward.

Mrs. Bray, in her introduction to this biography, says something about "the great men I could name in literature who are ever more ready to commend and to encourage than the little critics—those, I mean, who deem themselves critics, and who often possess not one essential requisite for true criticism;" and she adds the apophthegm, that "to throw a stone is an easy thing, but to hit the mark requires a pract sed eye and a steady hand." Now, disavowing any sympathy with the would be critics, who often, we agree, "possess not one essential requisite for true criticism," we must say, that, as far as our experience goes, there is more of indiscriminate praise than of unjust censure to be laid to their charge, and of the two, we think that the former is much more fatal to art, and more unjust to artists, than the latter. Merit will, in most cases, eventually make its way, in spite of unjust hostility, gaining, as it were, strength from opposition; in other cases, merit, as we have already said, may remain itself to neglect; but to be insulted with ignorant patronage, in common with a herd of unworthy associates, is what true merit must always bitterly feel and indignantly resent. It may be an easy thing to throw a stone at a mark, but it is at least as easy, if not easier, to throw a shovelful of plaster; and we all know the adage—

> Lay it on thick,
> Some of it will stick,

which is equally applicable to flattery as to abuse.

And if critics owe anything to art, to artists, and to the public, when they would pretend to guide—we were going to say educate—what must we think of one who tells us that an artist of very considerable merit certainly, but merit of a peculiar order, and who unfortunately chiefly confined his talents to the illustration of books, and has consequently not left a single great work behind him (we say "great" in the poetic sense as we understand it), was dismayed by the decorations of the staircase at Burleigh, with the paintings eight feet high") that this artist, Thomas Stothard to wit, combined in himself all the grace and imagination of Raphael and Parmegiano, the grandeur of Michael Angelo, the colouring of Rubens, and even condescended to add in his latter period the pre-like prettiness of Watteau? No one would believe it possible that indiscriminate flattery could run to such extremes, and that accidental circumstances which led to a matrimonial alliance between our authoress and the family of Mr.

* "Life of Thomas Stothard, R.A., with Personal Reminiscences." By Mrs. Bray. With numerous Illustrations on Wood. Murray.

Stothard should so have blinded her to the merit of all the rest of the world as to induce her to indulge in it. Yet so it is. In various passages in this volume we are told that Stothard was "the greatest historical painter this country ever produced;" that his book illustrations, produced in the early part of his industrious career, were of "the highest order of poetic composition;" that "nothing was ever more purely conceived or beautifully executed" than his illustrations of "Paradise Lost;" that his "'Jacob's Dream,' and the 'Angels appearing to the Shepherds,' will bear comparison with the compositions of the great master of the sacred school, Raphael;" that his "Boaz seeing Ruth gleaning" "reminds one of the old masters, to the finest of whose scriptural works it is in every way equal as a composition;" that "Stothard's drawings of these subjects (Cibber's figures of Melancholy and Raving Madness at Bethlem) at once remind the observer of the sublimity of Michael Angelo;" that his picture of "The Vintage," "his choice in which, as usual, was dictated by having a frame that happened to fit the picture," was "universally admired, and allowed by artists and such as were capable of appreciating its excellence to bear a marked resemblance to Rubens in richness and depth of colour, whilst in drawing and grace it was not inferior to Titian;" that he had all the humour, without the "vulgarity," of Hogarth; in short, not to go into any further comparisons, that—

VIEW OF THE KING'S BALL, AT ST. JAMES'S, ON THE KING'S BIRTHDAY, JUNE 4, 1789.

His genius was unlimited; it embraced every species of composition; every subject of the pencil—landscape, portrait, cities, architecture, sea-pieces, animals, birds, flowers, fruits, costume, even insects, &c;

> It may be briefly said of the excellences of this great painter, that his chief characteristics lay in the taste and feeling with which he treated his subject; the judgment that guided and governed both; and, above all, in the heights and depths of his homeless imagination an imagination so wonderful in itself as to be unknown in its exercise, that, as no other country has ever yet produced a painter who excelled him in the highest attributes of genius, so an age may pass away before we again, if ever, shall number among our most illustrious men his equal as a second Stothard in the annals of our English school of art.

Such extravagant assertions as these, whilst they cannot add one leaf to the laurels of their unfortunate object, may not unlikely provoke the ignorant critic of the stone-throwing school to deny him any merit at all, and to treat the whole subject with ridicule. Let us, however, take a different course, and, having disposed of the "chaff" with which he is now smothered, let us endeavour to do justice to the memory and talents of an artist of very considerable merit, of great industry, and of still greater modesty and simplicity of purpose, and who only wanted the spur of ambition and the "bump of self-esteem" to have earned a much more elevated niche than he has attained in the temple of fame.

Thomas Stothard was entirely a self-taught genius, and in the worldly sense, also, he was a self-made man; few artists have been less indebted to fashion and the patronage of the great. He was born of humble parents. His father kept a public-house in Long-acre, and at an early period the son was apprenticed to a draughtsman of silk patterns in Spital-square. Here he employed his leisure hours in reading Homer and Spenser, and making impromptu illustrations of what he read. Some of these were one day seen by Harrison, the publisher of the "Novelist's Library," who was so pleased with them, that he commissioned the youth to make three sketches for one of his novels, for which he rewarded him not very munificently with half-a-guinea. This sealed Stothard's fate: he took to book illustration as a business (improving himself at the same time in the higher callings of art), and with his scanty earnings from this source, and from the silversmiths who also employed him in drawing patterns, added to the interest of £1200 which his father left him, eked out a modest competency. Mrs. Bray, in the passage we have just quoted from her, speaks of "imagination" as pre-eminently the distinguishing characteristic of Stothard. Now, we believe the truth to be the very reverse. A man who, to the end of his life, was content to take any subjects that were given to him by silversmith, bookseller, or printseller—whose best work, and probably the only gallery picture that will survive to posterity, "The Canterbury Pilgrimage," was itself a commission from a printseller, the price being £60; and whose last employment, when upwards of seventy years of age, was rambling through wind and dust and rain, on the banks of the Dove, copying fish and fishing houses and local scenery, for an edition of "Walton's Angler" such a man could have very little imagination, considered in its highest attributes as a creative faculty, but on the contrary, must have been essentially real and practical. A curious illustration, by the way, of his unimpulsive disposition is found in the little story of his wooing and wedding the future partner of his life, as thus related in the volume before us:—

> Stothard, it seems, did not immediately win the object of his choice. But the fleetness of such a heart as his were incapable of change. For some time he paid [illegible] preferred his suit, and at length gained the hand of the fair Rebecca. But though his love was true and deep, it was a ways more or less accompanied with that serenity which formed a marked feature in his character. After he had [illegible] beloved to the altar, not to lose an hour from his studies even on the wedding-day, he conducted home his bride, and then very quietly walked, down to the Academy, to draw from the antique till three o'clock, the hour at which it closed. There he sat by the side of a fellow-student named Scott, with whom he was intimate, and, after drawing the usual time, at length he said to his friend, "I am now going home to meet a family party. Do come and dine with me, for I have this day taken to myself a wife!"
> Eleven children were, in due course, the reward of this calm proceeding. We have said that Stothard was eminently "real," and certainly, to a young man just struggling with his pencil for daily food and raiment, a wife and eleven children may be pronounced an astounding reality. It was one, too, which left him little opportunity to indulge in gratuitous fancies, or to lay up anything for posterity, even if he were inclined that way. Accordingly we are informed, that
> So increasing a family obliged him constantly to labour, and often to accept commissions that were too trifling and too minute an order for a painter of his master-mind and hand: for instance, such commissions as designing for [illegible] books, ladies' fashions, sketches of court balls and amusements, Royal [illegible]ings, and for ordinary engravings and play-books. But, so great was Stothard's love of art, and the simplicity of his character, that he made his designs for them with the same care, and threw into them the same exquisite grace, which he bestowed on the higher order of his works.

To all this we willingly adhere, adding this besides, that, in our opinion, his designs for these occasions, and, indeed, all his productions at this early period, when he had nothing but reality to follow, and his own simplicity of genius to guide him, were the best works he ever produced, and, admirable in themselves, fully entitle him to honourable mention as "the father" of an important school, namely, that for producing "beautiful illustrations as an accompaniment to the popular literature of England." His "View of the King's Ball at St. James's, on the King's Birthday, June 4, 1789," is one of the most exquisite and artistic studies it is possible to conceive of such a subject. The figures of the Prince and Princess going through the movements of a minuet are full of ease and grace and action; whilst the arrangement of the whole company is marked with rare propriety. The figures—King, Queen, courtiers, and all—are in perfect keeping; and no attempt is made to violate the decorum of such an occasion by breaking the level of the line of heads or figures, for the mere purpose of producing effect. Indeed, in the simplicity of his style at this period, Stothard reminds us of some of the very early artists of the Florentine school, Masaccio more particularly, whilst his accuracy and decision of hand in drawing warrant the appellation frequently accorded him, of the "English Giotto." Pity it was that he ever forsook his own inimitable style, marked with graceful homely truthfulness, in vain efforts to imitate, first Mortimer, then Raphael (1792), then Rubens (1796), then Titian, and, lastly, Watteau (circa 1810-20), with not one of whom he had by nature a point in common.

Mrs. Bray thinks otherwise, however, and, speaking of his "beautiful picture of the 'Confirmation,'"—in reality a very commonplace prayer book illustration she says, "He had now wholly emancipated himself from the school of Mortimer, and the very spirit of Raphael (whose compositions he had so deeply studied) seemed to live and breathe again in the works of Stothard"(!)

Now, we doubt the fact alleged, as well as the opinion propounded in this passage. Where, at this period (about 1790), had Stothard "so deeply studied the works of Raphael"? He had never at that time been out of England; and it was not till 1815, when he went to Paris for a fortnight, that, as far as we can learn, he had an opportunity of seeing a single painting by the great master referred to; and then he certainly caught a glimpse at the "Transfiguration," just as it was being packed up to be returned with other pictorial plunder to Italy: and of it, particularly the colouring, he expresses himself in a tone of admiration and astonishment which would go far in evidence, if we had no other, that until this time he had never known what Raphael as a painter was. With this exception, we have to believe that Stothard's means of studying Raphael were confined to the celebrated Cartoons, and to the prints in "Raphael's Bible," of both of which frequent mention is made in these pages.

Admirable, accurate, and graceful as a draughtsman, so far as representing what he understood (he was not master of the human figure, and seldom attempted it), he was weak and careless as to composition. Indeed, how could it be expected otherwise of an artist who in his life turned out "more than ten thousand designs," in not ten of which was his inventive faculty engaged? Mrs. Bray seems to admit this, for when, after affirming that "Stothard was the only painter who was ever fully equal to Hogarth in telling a continued story, that required the same characters to be repeated in different circumstances and positions," she admits that "Hogarth excelled him in being the author as well as the painter of his own tales; for what are Hogarth's pictures but novels, which appeal to the mind through the organ of sight, without the assistance of words to convey images, events, and ideas. Stothard embodied those already written for him."

Having in most cases to represent a simple event in a story, he did so with as few figures as possible, avoided complicated groupings, and, above all, that incidental by-play which to some of the great masters gives occasion for such ingenious display in the treatment of middle distances and backgrounds. His style, in short, was that especially adapted for sculpturesque treatment, and we are, therefore, not surprised at his success in the designs for silversmiths' work (more especially the Wellington Shield), and for the friezes and other decorative parts of Buckingham Palace (all of which have not been executed), as well as for some other works of sculpture.

The same consideration will account for his disregard of colour, and his humble position as a colourist. A man who produced "more than ten thousand designs" for the graver, and in the course of nearly sixty years only exhibited ninety works, and those often of the most trivial kind, and snatched at random from his working stock, could not be expected to pay much attention to this department of art.

Stothard's practice (we are to d) was never to paint a picture for Somerset House, but, when the time came for sending in, to take anything that lay about his painting-room or that was being got up in his drawing-room, for which he happened to have a frame that would fit (the truth is even this), and to send it off to the Exhibition. Some of these were so small that they were often scarcely visible in the surrounding combination of large canvases and broad gilt frames; and that harmony and repose and truth of colour, which was so beautiful and so perfectly natural in him, was in a moment overpowered by the meretricious glare of the place. Many of Stothard's friends pointed out to him the policy of consulting a little more the taste of the public at the Exhibition, and wished to prevail with him to paint a picture expressly for that atmosphere, but he never heeded them. He would not step an inch out of his way to gain popularity when he was sure of fame; and so little had he of the tact of the world within himself, that he never could comprehend its utility.

We cannot let this passage pass without a single observation upon its mischievous tendency, as calculated to bear upon the conduct of artists of the rising generation. Though we by no means pin our faith to popularity—temporary popularity, in its vulgar sense—we are fain to believe, that, in the large averages of cases, public opinion is just even to the living. The "popularity" of our own Hogarth, Reynolds, West, Lawrence, Wilkie, Callcott, Turner (who lived to survive the prejudice against his peculiar style), to say nothing of a host of others, is sufficient to redeem the multitude from the wholesale charge of fashionable stupidity and injustice implied in Mrs Bray's remarks. Of course, those who will not condescend to compete for public favour cannot complain if they are overlooked in the crowd of more eager and more painstaking competitors.

And whilst we are just to the many-headed monster, the public, let us also defend individuals from attacks made without sufficient grounds, and for no other purpose than to do excess of homage at the altar of one chosen name. We go back to page 23 of Mrs. Bray's Memoir, to the passage in the midst of which we left off, describing the miscellaneous, and often trifling, commissions which Stothard was obliged to accept, in order to meet the requirements of an increasing family. Mrs. Bray follows up these particulars with the following complaint:—

> Yet, if we consider how much below his merit were some of the tasks in which, at this period, he engaged, it is ever to be lamented that good King George III. (who so munificently patronised West, fancying he was encouraging the greatest living artist) had not bestowed his Royal countenance and bounty on Stothard; as, by giving him commissions, he would have given him independence, and enabled him to employ, on a scale and on subjects worthy of his genius, those astonishing powers with which he was endowed.

We will not enter into a comparison between West and Stothard, or their respective claims to be considered "the greatest living artist" of that day. We will only observe that at the period in question (about 1783-90) West was at the zenith of his fame, having been more than twenty years celebrated throughout the world as an historical painter of the highest order, whilst Stothard was only just setting out upon his more humble career, having, up to the year 1791 inclusive, exhibited only thirteen works at the Royal Academy, and these, with the exception of a "Holy Family," being the designs for his book illustrations, many of them in water-colours. When we consider this, and that Wilson, Gainsborough, Romney, Reynolds, Morland, and many more whose names have survived to fame, were at work during the greater part of the period referred to, we think we may fairly acquit "good King George III." of any injustice in not seeking and singling out a young man of five and twenty, who had positively done nothing for fame or popularity, for the bestowal of "his Royal countenance and bounty." Let it be remembered, also, that the Royal patronage of West ceased in 1801, upon the King's illness, and that West's greatest works, namely, "Christ healing the Sick," "Christ rejected by the Jewish High Priest," and "Death on the Pale Horse," were executed after that date—when the artist was verging upon seventy years of age—so courageous is genius when left to its own resources!

Another equally groundless and unavailing complaint is that against a very distinguished amateur, himself an artist of no mean ability, and to whom the arts of this country are indebted, as well for the example of his patronage, as for the munificent collection which he bequeathed to the National Gallery at his death—we mean Sir George Beaumont. Mrs. Bray says:—

A circumstance, also, which might have contributed to injure him (Stothard) in the early part of his career, was, that an amateur landscape-painter, Sir George Beaumont, whose rank and fortune gave more authority to his opinions than from his own talents they were entitled to claim, never could understand or acknowledge the genius of Stothard. And as Sir George's opinions very much set the fashion of his day in art, as to who was or who was not to be admired, in all probability Stothard suffered by soaring above his comprehension, and therefore being deprived of his praise.

Now, here again we will not enter into an argument with our authoress upon mere matters of opinion. In justice to Sir George Beaumont, however, who "could not understand or acknowledge the genius of Stothard," as exemplified in the numerous book illustrations executed by him in the early period of his career, in addition to half a dozen small unpretending sketches exhibited at the Royal Academy, let us state that that gentleman was only two years Stothard's senior, and submit that it is going a little too far to blame a young man of taste and fashion, of five and twenty or thirty, for not instinctively discovering the latent talents of the man who was to become the "greatest historical painter this country ever produced."

A little attention to dates would have spared us much of this blundering; and it would have led to the exclusion of a passage which closely follows upon those just quoted, in which the name and authority of Sir Joshua Reynolds are brought as a set-off against the prejudices of an aged King and a very young baronet:—

In 1792 Stothard was elected an associate of the Royal Academy, and exhibited his beautiful picture of the "Confirmation." Next, "Comus" was also illustrated, and several striking events in English history, such as the "Marriage of Henry V. with Catherine of France;" "Richard the First's return from Palestine;" that chivalrous King's meeting with Isaac Prince of Cyprus; six designs from "Telemachus;" the "Dryads finding Narcissus," and various other works. The last ten cited were exhibited at the Royal Academy, and Mrs. Bray says:—"Great must have been the gratification of Sir Joshua Reynolds when he saw works not unworthy of the schools of Raphael and Parmejano produced by one whom, but a few years before, he had singled out as the most promising of all the students in the Academy of which he was the head." Great, indeed, must have been the gratification of Sir Joshua, but greater still his astonishment at the circumstance described, seeing that these works were exhibited, the "Confirmation" in the summer of 1792, and the other ten in the summer of 1793, whilst Sir Joshua Reynolds died in February, 1792!

We have gone at considerable length into our consideration of this work, because, seeing, or fancying we see, the advent of brighter days for art not far distant, we feel the importance of all that relates to the art-education both of artists and of the public. And surely it is not by such fond and ill-judged rhapsodies as those we have been reading that a love for art is to be fostered, a right appreciation of art inculcated, or a respect for art-criticism inspired in the minds of the general public. Surely it is not encouraging to those about to adopt the arts as a profession, to be told that "the greatest historical painter" this country ever saw, or may hope to see, was so little appreciated, and so ill requited, that he was content to sketch book decorations and design ornamental plate for the tables of Royalty and the nobility to the last; and that, "as nothing came amiss to him," in 1809, a period of life when he should have been at the summit of fame, he was fain to accept a commission from Messrs. Rundle and Bridge for "a large transparency, which was displayed in front of their house and greatly admired on the jubilee day held in honour of George III. having reigned fifty years;" and that, on the rejoicings for the general peace in 1814, he was employed to paint one of four compartments of another transparency for a sort of rotary panorama, exhibited amongst other illuminations in Hyde-park, and which of the four, notwithstanding it was exhibited wrong side out, "was by far the most admired;" and that, for some fête given by the Prince Regent at Carlton House, about this period, Stothard also painted a transparency, which was displayed in the supper-room, "but of which," the authoress says, "I do not know the subject;" and finally, that at the end of a long life, whilst thus employed, he was still so unknown to fame that the Mecænas of the age—the Prince Regent, we mean—whilst looking at the aged painter so decorating the scene of an impending orgie, asked him "whether he was not a foreigner!"

No, no, not a thousand times no! The world is not all so base, so stupid, so pig-headed, that such things should be without some error of judgment, some error of direction or purpose in the artist himself, and which those of the rising generation would therefore do well to investigate, to bear in mind, and to avoid.

DARIEN; OR, THE MERCHANT PRINCE.*

These volumes will be read with peculiar and painful interest as the last contribution to the literature of his country of a man endowed with no ordinary gifts of intellect—gifts which he has always used in a highly conscientious spirit, as the means of advancing, in an enlarged sense, the common interests of the great human family. To him the world was a theme which he loved to study as a book; turning back the pages of its history, and bringing the past, the present, and the future to throw their varied hues over a picture in which extreme distances of space and extreme diversities of feature were likewise blended with uncommon mastery of handling.

Eliot Warburton's active and productive genius is aptly exemplified in the very opening of the dedicatory epistle attached to the present volumes:—

Dear * * *

From most of the various countries to which my vagrant propensities, from time to time, have led me, I have despatched to you some such bulky MSS. as accompany this note, &c.

Ere yet the pages to which these words were intended to serve as the introduction were before the reading public the writer was again indulging his thirst for foreign adventure; and again, with an important task on hand, had set out upon a journey to that very new land to which these volumes relate—a task and a journey which he was never doomed to accomplish!*

With a mind deeply affected by the sad and fearful calamity which has ranked Eliot Warburton amongst its victims, we opened the present volumes more with the intention of holding converse with the spirit of the writer in detached passages of poetic beauty, which we knew must abound in this as in all his other works, than of following out the thread of a continuous story to the end. And, in this musing and half-dreaming humour, we had not proceeded through many pages of the first volume when we came across a passage of sublime but melancholy thought, which it is almost impossible to dissociate from the cruel catastrophe which has since occurred, and of which it would almost seem to be prophetic. The veteran Lieut. M'Gregor (an admirably-drawn character, by the way), with whom the author makes agreeable acquaintance in the Highlands, and in company with whom he rambles over mountain and by stream in that wild country, holds forth in this manner in a moment of uncontrolled and devotional enthusiasm:—

"Behold!" he exclaimed, in a voice from which passion, and, strange to say, almost all national accent, was banished; "behold how the sun, the apostle of light, is sinkly softly and meekly, though crowned with preternatural glory, into the crimsoned sea. His light is shining not for himself, but for the earth, so darksome and so dead without his rays. Behold how many a lock and mountain gleam and gloom through the evening mist, as sunset invests them with rich gold and purple! Now he is gone, deep masses of indistinct shadow close over the silvering sea: and now, but for the rosy light that lingers on the sky and on Ben Laignal's brow, no trace remains of the Life-giver—the Creator's delegate. He is gone; yet nature mourns him not; earth and ocean, man, bird, beast, and insect, secure in the faith that he will rise to-morrow—rise, with all his infinite effects, at the very moment which, if delayed, would cost the life of myriad myriads of rejoicing creatures. How weak and faltering is our voluntary faith compared with that which is instinctive! Yet is the moral sequence of events as consistent and as certain as those of night and day. Rebellious children as we are, we love, like our first parents, to stake the chances of sma' events against the certainty of great ones. The devil takes care to keep the bad chances Just alive; but how greatly we are losers in the long run, we hearly feel—and shall feel far more when this life at the last shall thus close over us."

A few pages on we meet with the following reflection, evidently betokening a resigned rather than a cheerful mind:—

Our demands on happiness (or at least on pleasures) contract and expand in a wonderful manner, according as they are indulged in or denied. It would almost seem as if it were but the first spasm of contraction that is painful, and the first sense of expansion that is truly enjoyable. The tradesman is indifferent to comforts that would be delightful luxuries to the labourer; the prince is unconscious of enjoyments that would be intoxicating to his page. Hence, as is most righteous, the man whose sources of pleasure are most scanty has the widest range of possible delights; and he who possesses all that this world can bestow has a fearfully narrow pinnacle to stand upon, all around him offering only a comparative privation. Herein is contained an important cause of the balance (more equal than we generally believe) between the lot of one individual and another—between our own former and present state. The sometime task pervade the poor, the bereaved, the exiled, the sick, the dying, are often beyond our comprehension, yet they may be any day within our reach and our experience.

Another reflection, of a different character, but still suggestive of the existence of a highly imaginative temperament:—

It is curious to consider the invisible threads of destiny by which each human being is bound to some other, who walks about, all unconscious of the influence which his spiritual being, or a mere abstraction of him, is exercising upon his fellow-beings. Let us look along a street, and contemplate the crowds that are therein hastening to and fro, each with his mind's eye fixed on some invisible object; but all, as far as the general effect is concerned, appearing as confused and unconnected as the denizens of a disturbed ant-hill. Each of the human forms there moving about, and vulgarised into vagueness by the monotonous dominoes of calico or muslin or broadcloth, and the mask of smiles or frowns—each of these creatures is haunted by some phantom, whom in turn he phantom haunts. He or she is never alone. Always some imaginary presence, whether cheerful or depressing, is with them; and that wonderful variety of expression of countenance which we behold is caused by the unseen companion-ons. Even when one man stops to greet another, his attention is not fixed on him alone; it is diverted by a host of invisible others, who are with him now, because they were with him (either in the flesh or out of the flesh) when he was last met. This is the true source of the distraction that men experience in a crowd. As at the old Roman feasts, each summoned guest brought his "shadow," and oftimes very many; so the imaginary world is peopled to overflowing, and our own phantom goes jostling on through a crowd of other phantoms until it is well weary.

It is remarkable, also, to say the least of it, to find the author, in this his last work, published on the eve of embarking on a voyage across the Atlantic, dwelling upon disasters by sea: there are two vivid descriptions of shipwreck and two of ship-burning in these volumes. We extract one passage only from the account of a disaster of the latter kind:—

The remaining Spaniard was now on fire forward, and her dry sails burned up rapidly into three pillars of flame. The despairing crew had retreated to the lofty poop, and were trying to lower their boats; but Lawrence ranged up alongside and poured in a steady fire of musketry, under which they fell fast. Among them was seen a Dominican friar standing with folded arms, awaiting his fate with stern composure. But, as soon as the Buccaneer was near enough to be recognised, he addressed Lawrence as an old acquaintance, and commanded him to cease firing, and to send his boat to take him on board. Lawrence crossed himself, and turned away. The firing was renewed for a few minutes, but the flames had now eaten their way aft, and were creeping up to the poop. The Buccaneer stood away to avoid the explosion which must soon take place, and the miserable Spanish crew threw themselves into the sea. There for a few minutes they remained floundering about, but they were soon suddenly twitched under water, and the quickly-reddening waves showed that the sharks were busily at work. The friar's dark form was still to be seen on the ship, relieved of the flames, that towered up behind him: all at once they ceased, as if concentrating all their efforts below, and then shot up into the sky, scattering far and wide every remnant of the ship.

The following little bit will come home with telling effect to the heart of many, the object of whose affections are perilled upon the dark ocean:—

After a long pause, he observed to her that she did not seem pleased with the thought of leaving London. She replied that "all places were the same to her, except for one reason; she heard more news in London, and that amused her." In fact, she was like those who have lost dear relatives at sea, and who love to soothe their sorrows by sitting on the shore and watching the waves as they come and go, in some dreamy expectation that somehow they may bring tidings of those who have gone down among their fellows. Such was the news that Isobel watched for by the ebb and flow of life's great stream in London.

We now turn to the subject matter of this historical romance, which commences at that period when the tyranny of the Church of Rome was at its height, and its cup of wickedness nearly at the full; when over the new as well as over the old Continent its emissaries were torturing and roasting men's bodies, not for the good of their souls, but to hasten them on their way to eternal perdition! We allude to that critical moment when James II., the last and vilest of the Stuarts, sought to restore the Pope's authority in Britain, and so to reduce the whole world into one huge priestly pandemonium; a consummation which happily for humanity, was averted by the glorious revolution which placed William of Orange upon the throne of these realms, and authoritatively denounced "the damnable errors" as I still more "damnable" practices of Popery. Meanwhile, however, Spain Catholic, bigoted Spain held sway over her newly-conquered lands of the western hemisphere; and, whilst she sent their children to the stake, her galleons brought home the spoil of their wealth to gild an already rotten and declining dynasty. What Spain was then, and what she might have been, is a theme thus briefly, but nervously, touched upon:—

Spain is the country, of all Europe, in which imagination most delights to wander, and on which memory most loves to dwell. Those who know it only by its romantic history and racy literature can understand much of its deep interest; but those alone who have gazed upon its glorious landscapes, and breathed its delicious climate, can fully appreciate the charm it possesses for the mind and body.

No wonder that, in the adventurous olden time, this favoured land was fiercely fought for, and fiercely defended. No wonder that chivalry was here carried to perfection—that poetry proclaimed its triumphs—that art, in its finest forms, illustrated them, and that civilisation, in its most gorgeous and at least consistent form, strove hard to find a site for there.

But come, with her spiritual power, was more than a match for Spain with all her endowments. The Pope ruled in the person of her Kings; priests held in their hands the consciences of her people. Never had the Church of the Seven Hills such power over any nation; never had any nation such a claim upon her blessings, for Spain was not only obedient but enslaved to her control. In the palace, in the prison, at the death-bed, by the bridal couch, everywhere, and at all times, the priest was present and predominant. There was the most triumphant career of the Inquisition. There did the Holy Office exercise its functions uncontrolled; there auto-da-fés were celebrated with the largest pomp, and the Church's rebus: praised by thousands in the flames.

With all these spiritual blessings superadded to her natural gifts, Spain ought surely to have been a perfect paradise. Yet it was not altogether, or, indeed, nearly so. and what matter there was of congratulation or honest pride was little referable to the temperium ex imperio whom Rome asserted over the souls and bodies of her Spanish slaves. Striking and sad contrasts met the eye two hundred years ago, as they do now. Gorgeous cathedrals, or rather splendid wretchable huts; whole streets of monasteries swarming with monks; mighty palaces surrounded with filth, orange groves reeking with foul odours. The State of Spain was contemptible in the midst of its splendour and its pride, and its moral and political contrasts were equal to those of its magnificence and squalor that were ever neighbours to each other. Despotic power vainly warred against petty rebellions; the Customs were set at naught by the contrabandistas; the richest of all nations, as regarded precious metals, was the poorest in real wealth; and even the terrible power of the Church was frequently evaded by the Jew and the Mahometan.

The proceedings of an auto-da-fé are described with boldness and minuteness of outline enough to make the reader shudder and turn from the recital with loathing, but for the manly and terrible denunciations of the author against the wretches who battened and fattened upon these "offices" of the Holy Church, and the system which could pretend to support itself by such atrocities. We give an abridged extract from this passage:—

The procession was soon re-formed on the scaffold. The prisoners, of all descriptions, arrayed in one dense mass; their priestly judges standing apart, and between the two parties a pulpit, from which a Jesuit fulminated the brutal censures of his church upon her victims; for most of them, his words were the last ever to be heard from a minister of religion. Though he preached with all the fiery eloquence of the south, it was probably not appreciated by many there: his theme was the glories of the Inquisition, the best supporter of the Church—how grateful its performances were in the sight of Heaven; how blessed its agency on the earth; how merciful it was, how potent, how infallible!

After a long discourse, by way of peroration, the Jesuit read over the names and sentences of those who stood before him. Then, turning to the chief magistrate, he delivered his victims to his charge.

"The Holy Office," he added, in a calm benignant voice, "hath now discharged its duties. The Church delivers these, her rebellious children, over to the arm of this world's law, beseeching that their lives be not endangered and that no blood be shed!"

* * * * *

The soldiery had now laden the victims of the Inquisition with heavy chains, and were leading them away to the place of punishment, without the city walls. It is unnecessary to say that the Jesuit's recommendation to mercy was a mere form a cruel lie. The condemned were urged along as rapidly as their condition would permit; some, unable to walk, had their dislocated forms rudely borne along to the final agony. * * * *

At length the fatal terrible arena is reached, and another roar of exultation rose from the fanatical crowd that thronged the space around it.

Within that space are thirty tall, stout stakes, each twelve feet high, and each furnished with a rude sort of seat about eight feet from the ground. These stakes are disposed in two circles, one within the other; a heap of dried furze and firewood lies piled at the foot of each: in a small brazier, close by, there is a small but very lively fire. The victims, as they arrive, are marched to their allotted stakes. Ten of them, who had professed "penitence," are then quietly, and with horrible sang froid, strangled by the executioners; their yet warm corpses then hoisted up and chained on the inner circle of stakes. For the "impenitent" a more protracted suffering remained. A ladder is placed against each stake, and the victim is compelled to mount it until he reaches the seat, to which he is bound firmly with wet cords, his legs dangling downwards towards the faggots. All this occupies a cruelly long time, though many zealous hands assist. At length all the preparations are completed, and high over the heads of the eager multitude are to be seen the thirty forms of their doomed fellow-creatures—some swaying themselves to and fro, as far as their cords will allow, in agonized suspense; some proudly, nobly calm; and some, scarcely more tranquil—the "penitents," whose sufferings are ended, and whose lifeless heads hang down upon their breasts.

They formed an awful group—those martyrs, or whatever else they were, elevated there, shrined on, as if in mockery, by the calm setting sun, while their black robes, with the emblazoned flames and devils, were about in the breeze, and give an appearance of quivering life even to the dead.

But the people grow impatient, as at a bull-fight, when they thirst for blood and cry for the matador. Fierce fanatic yells salute the victims' ears, and, in a phraseology well understood by the frequenters of such scenes, some voices call out to—"Beard them!" beard the heretics!" Thereupon, an executioner seizes a long lance, furnished at the point with a bunch of furze dipped in oil. The pile lights at the brazier, and then thrusts it, flaming, into the nearest victim's face, pressing the thorny brand so closely to the mouth as almost to stifle the wild shriek for mercy that bursts from the sufferer's lips.

"Let us see him!" shout the multitude; "let us see if the bearding is well done!" The brand is removed, and, oh God! what a fearful change has been made in thy handiwork by that inquisitorial touch! So little of the countenance remained, that, scorched, and shrivelled, and featureless, it seemed no longer human; the very organs of the voice were changed; the wretch's shrieks had settled into a faint, prolonged, and wild unearthly moan!

And now the faces beneath are lighted, and the flames with forked tongues dart up and lick the victim's feet at first; and then his knees, which again contracting in his agony, double up and set fire to the cords upon his breast, which burns mockingly but kills not. And at the same time the other faggots are lighted, and thirty fires blaze up at once, and there are sounds most horrible to hear, and dark figures writhing in the flames most horrible to see, and overpowering smells of scorching flesh; and the people are yelling in fierce and frantic glee; and their inquisitorial priests hold up their hands to heaven and solemnly consign the souls of the departing sufferers to the fiend—the ghostly enemy of man. The sacrifice is ended; the last heart of the heretics has ceased to beat; consummated is the triumph of the Church of Rome!

But the principal subject of the book, as the title implies, is the scheme for colonising the Isthmus of Darien, set afoot towards the end of the seventeenth century by a Scotchman of the name of Paterson. The scheme was favoured, in the first instance, by William III., and a large subscription list was speedily filled, in which Scotland figured to the tune of £400,000, England contributing £200,000, and Hamburg £200,000. With this vast sum, vast considering the time, Paterson and his associates went to work with energy, drawing freely on their supposed capital for the equipment of the first expedition on a scale commensurate with its importance." The very greatness of the scheme, and its early promise of success, however, tended to its defeat. The merchants of London were astounded at the magnitude of the enterprise; and the East India Company, in particular, were thrown into a panic, and remonstrated against the scheme in a petition to the King. It appears that they had some pretence for so doing, as the East Indies had been unfortunately inserted in Paterson's charter, with a view to trading from the opposite side of the isthmus, and even Africa also:—

The English Parliament then met, and the Darien scheme was too popular a subject not to be made a matter of eager debate. The feeling of the Parliament was hostile. It even impeached some of its members for joining in a scheme "so injurious to English commerce." The King saw fit to yield to the altered tone of public feeling: he actually made a sort of apology for the encouragement he had bestowed upon the scheme: he confessed "that he had been ill advised in Scotland," and he at once revoked all his favourable dispositions toward the company. The English subscriptions were withdrawn, and, under the threat of England's displeasure, Hamburg and Holland, after some squabbling (and deprecating any fear of England as their motive for doing so), likewise withdrew.

Scotland was then left to conduct her enterprise single-handed, only guarded by such privileges to the company as the King had not ventured to retract. Far more merciful would it have been to have suppressed it utterly, than first have allowed the expedition to take place, and then cruelly have consigned its volunteers to destruction!

The Scotch party, however, still held on their way with all the more determined purpose for being left to themselves. But, unfortunately, they were actuated too deeply by the spirit of jobbing, which has been the bane and ruin of many of the finest public projects in all times. After some difficulty in collecting the subscriptions and the necessary stores, owing to a pressure and scarcity which prevailed at the time, the expedition was pronounced ready to set sail:—

The rotten ships, gaily painted and bedecked with flaunting flags, were filled with all the provisions, most carefully made up, in order to conceal the imposture. Certain bales of goods and merchandise, also of a very inferior description, were placed in the ships, in order to traffic with the natives of the Land of Promise, as well as with the Christian inhabitants of the West Indian Islands, for provisions: with these goods invoices were sent, having a exorbitant value upon every article.

To crown all, these ill-fated ships were commanded by coarse, brutal, and ignorant captains, jealous of, and hostile to, one another. The "Council" which accompanied them had no superior, no decisive authority. There was no chief, and every one aspired to command; the ingenuity of man could not have devised a plan more evidently anarchical. Paterson had been allowed no voice in any of the proposed arrangements: through jealousy, he had not even been named as one of the Council. He entered his ship as ignorant of her equipment as any seaman on board. He proposed, indeed, even then, to hold an inspection of the stores before the ships weighed anchor, but this was sagely forbidden, for reasons which are not difficult to divine.

We pass over the graphic account of the voyage of the fleet of five vessels which started under these dubious auspices. The little band of colonists landed on Golden Island, at the mouth of the harbour of Acta, and immediately "clambered up to the highest point, and followed with delighted eyes the finger of Paterson, as he pointed out the various beauties of the promised land. Every spot visible on the wild horizon was full of interest to them. Each bay might yet shelter friendly fleets; each tuft of palm-trees might shade an adventurer's future home; each bold promontory might support a fortress on which the dear country's flag should wave!"

Such the promise—how bitter the disappointment, how great the shipwreck of great aspirations, is matter of painful history, the details of which are given with vigorous and truthful colouring in the remaining pages of this work. The author, however, hazards the expression of his conviction, that, "had it not been for England's fatal jealousy, and the King's unworthy prejudice, there is little doubt that a city would there have been founded to which all the commercial capitals of the universe must finally have yielded precedence."

This observation opens up a wide field for philosophic speculation, upon which it would be useless now to enter, however intrinsically interesting in the abstract. How might not the destinies of the British nation, and of the new lands peopled by it, have been altered from what they have since been, if we had a century and a half ago possessed the key to the Pacific Ocean, and if Californian gold had reached us earlier, to prevent the occasion for an odious tea duty? England and America might still have been in the relation of parent and child, or at least of sisters; the principle of resistance to Kings and kingly prerogatives, which was so signally set, and so successfully established, as the result of the American war, would not have been included amongst the precedents of history; and is it going too far to say that the French revolution itself might have been averted, or modified in its features and conditions; the wild European anarchy which ensued prevented; the Bourbons still on the throne of France; Bonaparte perhaps still living as a retired officer on half-pay; Waterloo unstained by human carnage; and our national debt still at the modest figure of some £150,000,000, if not wholly paid off?

In taking leave of these volumes we have only to add that we have seldom met with any work in which the realities of history and the poetry of fiction were more happily interwoven, in which a greater variety of character and incident was concentrated within the same space. The female characters are of exquisite beauty, and give a charm to the rougher features of the narrative which it would be impossible to surpass or overrate; but we will not anticipate the pleasure of the reader by introducing them hastily, even by name, on the present occasion.

HISTORICAL, BIOGRAPHICAL, and GENEALOGICAL ATLAS. Designed and Compiled by HENEAGE LOWTH. London: Simpkin and Marshall. Leamington: J. Glover.

Addressing itself more especially to educational purposes, this atlas will certainly be found useful to teachers and pupils, and equally so to all interested in European history, as being, perhaps, the most concise compendium of historical reference yet published. Besides the mapping out of History, Biography, and Genealogy—of itself a novelty to claim attention, and executed with much skill and perspicuity—there is added a translation of the valuable historical summary of Lesage's great French work on "Universal History;" all which, with the typographical neatness and moderate price of the work, must ensure for it a very general circulation.

INGENIOUS APPLICATION OF GUTTA PERCHA.—A process for causing gutta percha to adhere firmly to the metallic structure necessary for the support of artificial teeth, and for preserving it from the friction of the tongue, has been invented by Mr. Truman, of 93, Old Burlington-street, and is a matter of importance to many persons. By the method employed, the bulk and weight of the apparatus usually made use of is avoided, and the painful effects of the pressure of hard metal upon the gums removed, the elastic nature of gutta percha admitting of the closest contact with them without inconvenience. The substance is also coloured by a contrivance which closely imitates the natural colour of the gums. The invention, though simple and without any complexity, is precisely efficacious, and answers the purpose for which it is intended very completely.

THE BEGINNING OF A GREAT CHANGE.

"A YEAR of greater anomalies," it has been remarked, "than 1851 has never been witnessed. To the mass of the people it has been the most prosperous on record; while to the mercantile classes, owing to their having speculated for rising prices in the face of increased production and cheaper transit, it has been chequered by anxiety and prolonged losses." But the mercantile classes have not been the only sufferers in this year. The landowners in many cases have been obliged to lower their rents. The farmers in almost every district have complained; and we must believe that, in general, both farmers and landowners have been suffering. Such a combination of circumstances as great prosperity in the mass of the people, great manufacturing activity, great exports and great imports, and distress amongst merchants, farmers, and landlords, has rarely, if ever before, existed.

It has been noticed, year after year, with some exultation, by the organs of Free Trade, that large quantities of corn have been imported, and all have gone into consumption. But the mere statisticians who record such facts very often neglect to notice their causes and to trace their consequences. For that purpose minds of a different order are required. There is a minute and increasing division of labour in literary pursuits, as well as in cabinet-making and engineering; and, taking some of the facts which other persons have frequently brought before the public, we shall confine our attention to what has gone before and what is likely to come after them. Statements of facts, though always instructive, are not all that is necessary; some are very generally omitted, and those who examine them with care discover in them relations and connecting links which often escape the notice of those who record them.

Every one knows that a great improvement has taken place in the condition of the people in connexion with an alteration in our commercial laws. The average quantity of wheat and flour, stated as wheat, entered for consumption in the three years prior to 1846, when the Parliament altered the Corn-laws—the alteration to take place prospectively in 1849 was 1,638,412 quarters. The average quantity of the three years ending 1851, including only eleven months of the last year, was 5,331,852 quarters. Thus, exclusive of all other kind of grain, amounting to 5,000,000 quarters more annually, there has been consumed, since 1849, upwards of 4,000,000 quarters of wheat annually more than prior to 1846. In the same period no land has gone out of cultivation; but more wheat has been grown at home since 1849 than before. There has been, therefore, in these latter years, an annual increase of consumption equivalent to one fifth, or even one-fourth, of the whole.

Before 1846 the upper and middle classes, and their immediate dependents and retainers, had as much bread to eat as they cared for. They eat no more now than they did then. Their numbers have increased somewhat in the interval, but nothing equal to one-fifth, nor even one fiftieth, of the whole population. The bulk, therefore, of the large quantity eaten more than before has fallen to the share of the lower classes. Since 1849 these classes have actually consumed, man for man, woman for woman, and child for child, nearly one-fifth more bread than before. Where they ate four quartern loaves per week before 1849, they have since eaten five. But amongst those called, very improperly perhaps, the lower classes, except the phrase be understood in its material sense as the enduring foundation on which the whole society rests, there are many who were in receipt of good wages and who consumed as much bread formerly as now. From that we may infer, therefore, that the greater part of the increased consumption has taken place amongst the very poorest of the lower classes, who have actually eaten in the last three years one-fifth more food than formerly.

This looks at the question merely under the aspect of quantity, without reference to price. But in the same interval the price of wheat has fallen a full fourth, from 52s 3d. to 38s. Generally speaking, there has been no corresponding fall of wages; in many branches of business there has, in fact, been a rise, and in almost all branches, employment has been unprecedentedly continuous and active. As examples and proofs, we may observe that the whole exports of the United Kingdom, which are a test of the work done, have been:—

1850	65,756 032
1851	68,314 272
Average of three years	64 327,396
Average of 1844 to	58 894,083
Average increase	£5,433 313

Men not much accustomed to deal with millions will at once conclude that an increase of upwards of five millions sterling in our export trade is an enormous sum; and so it is. The imports at the same time have kept pace with the exports; and, in fact, to the annoyance of such gentlemen as Mr. Newdegate, have exceeded them. Cotton and silk, depending like wheat on the seasons, are varying in quantities; and, the last two years having been unfavourable for both these crops, the imports of cotton and silk have not exactly kept pace with other things. Still in these articles, the staples of our manufactures, and in hides, timber, drugs, and all other things necessary for the success-ful prosecution of our industry, there has been a great and a continual increase. In the year 1848 our exports fell off very considerably, but that was a year of Continental disturbance, and our trade suffered from the convulsions of our neighbours: with this exception, both our imports and our exports have gone on continually increasing. The latter have amply paid for the former; and testifying to the fact, that, in conjunction with a great increase in the quantity of corn at the command of the people, and a reduction of its price, there has been a continual increase of employment at comparatively high wages. We may expect from that circumstance to find that the imports of other articles on which the workpeople are likely to spend their wages are also increased. They are, in fact, great consumers of cotton and woollen garments, if not of silk, and a great part of the increased importation of cotton and wool is for their use. These articles have become cheaper as well as more abundant; and thus they are better clothed, as well as better fed. Without going very deeply into the statistics of the articles they consume, we shall merely remark, that coffee, tea, sugar, dried fruits, provisions of all kinds, the imports of which have successively increased since 1842, have again very much increased in the year that has just elapsed. Thus the consumption of tea in the eleven months of 1851, for which the tables are published, was 49,764,193 lb., against 47,392,173 lb. in 1850. That increased consumption is almost entirely due to the lower classes. The consumption of some other articles in eleven months of the two years for which the accounts are published we will place before our readers in a tabular form:—

	Cocoa	Sloes	Figs	Coffee	Currants—cwt	Raisins—cwt
1850—26,535	121 395	6,612	29,005,273	368,266	5,8[illegible]4 951
1851—33,962	161,926	14,971	30,170,020	418,210	6,2[illegible]3 [illegible]

All these masses of articles are consumed by the humbler classes; and the increased consumption of them, in conjunction with a much greater increased consumption of bread, speaks volumes in favour of the improved material condition, not of any one little class, but of the bulk of the working people.

Consistently with the complaints of the farmers, the landowners, and the mercantile classes, the imports of some articles of which they are the principal consumers have not increased. Thus, ornamental glass, gloves, spirits wines, spices of all kinds, are diminished in 1851; and from such facts we may infer that the middle and upper classes have not been proportionably so well off as the lower classes. In fact, the national prosperity has been emphatically the prosperity of the lower classes. The upper and middle classes have not been proportionably enriched. The tide which has hitherto carried these classes apart, in respect to their condition and enjoyments, making, as Mr. Gladstone and others have pathetically bewailed, the "poor poorer, and the rich richer," has now effectually turned, and is bringing them together. We have been told the same fact in other language. The mingling of all classes at the Exhibition is one confirmation of it; men of all ranks and conditions crowding the railway carriages is another. The fact known to us before is rather confirmed than revealed by these statistics, and, if we have not arrived at a turning point for society, there can be no question that the change noticed is the herald of a great improvement in the condition of the people. It is a startling and delightful fact that, the MANY have begun to overtake the FEW in respect to material enjoyments. It seems as if the former had reached a point at which they could not be deteriorated further in relation to the others without injuring these; and at which the few could not obtain further improvement except by improving the many. A process has begun, then, by which the latter are gradually rising to the standard of the former; and the few, learning to treat lightly, as is the fact, the material enjoyments their ancestors delighted in, will have no other goal before them but that of the intellect opening-up new sources of happiness and greatness for all. By Canning and other writers this has been named the age of diffusion, and it now emphatically deserves the name, by diffusing pretty equally over all material comforts and enjoyments as well as knowledge.

In former times very great changes took place in the condition of society, but, in general, the persons who brought them about failed to notice them, and they were not recorded till long after they had come into existence. Changes are still going on, but it is a part of our good fortune to live surrounded by numerous observers, whose duty it is, and who find an ample reward in doing it, to notice all changes as they arise, and chronicle them for the general benefit. We are thus made aware of changes when they commence; we learn to appreciate them with more kindness and receive them with more toleration than our ancestors. We are better prepared for their consequences, and do not attempt, by penal enactments, by racks and dungeons, by the gallows and the faggot, to drive back the advancing waves of improvement. For the improvement of the lower classes now all other classes are prepared. They have felt that it was needed, and have laboured to effect it. That it has begun and is making rapid progress, the few facts we have quoted unanswerably demonstrate. That it will continue, is not so certain. The great increase in their command over the necessaries of life may be only temporary; we hope it will be permanent, and we shall state some of the reasons for this hope.

It has been repeatedly noticed, that, whenever a spurt takes place in prosperity, and the multitude take a step upwards, it requires a long period to degrade them to their former level. Men aspire to good and cling to good, and only a long series of adverse circumstances can drive them from it. With us the multitude have a clear conception of material enjoyment; they see it continually before their eyes, and, as they attain so they will keep it. Far from going back, what they now get will only be a stepping-stone to help them upwards to the highest point of civilisation.

From the increased command of food now obtained by the multitude, we may expect a physical improvement in the population. Plenty gives vigour. A deficiency of food, accompanied as it necessarily is by all other deficiencies, degrades both body and mind. To the vast increase of the supply of food we have noticed there appears no limit. There may be temporary interruptions, from bad seasons, and even from wars, to the increase; but the skill and eagerness with which the work of production is now carried on in almost every land are guarantees of continued abundance. There is amongst men a disposition to get wealth by honest exertion. From the present and future abundance there will grow a stronger generation. The spindle-shanked, hollow-chested labourers of the southern agricultural districts will disappear—children born in these plentiful times will be stouter and more healthy than their progenitors. They will be able to appreciate the greater comforts and wider accommodation that are now admitted to be necessary for the very humblest. With improved bodies there will be vigorous minds; and, while the intellect of the few will be directed only to intellectual improvements, the intellect of the many will grow powerful, and be capable of appreciating all that the few may discover. As the rule, the human race never retrogrades, and the advances now rapidly making are the means of making more rapid advances in future. Great as are the wonders already achieved by industry and intelligence, they are, probably, trifling compared with those which will be achieved by our successors. The different progress made by a community like that of one of our West India Islands, where the bulk of the inhabitants were slaves, and a community like that of the United States, or of New South Wales, where the majority are free, the advantages of fertility and proximity to markets being on the side of the West India Islands, indicates the difference between the past progress of the bulk of the nation, when stinted in food and stinted in mind, and its future progress, now that food is abundant and the whole nation becoming intellectual.

The economical considerations connected with this change are also of great importance. As the rule, saving is generally made by the middle classes; and though small savings made by the humbler classes amount in the year, and in the course of years, to a considerable sum, yet is the bulk of the national capital annually increased chiefly by the savings of the middle classes. All the coffee, sugar, tea, and breadstuffs imported have gone into consumption; and except the profit made by the mercantile classes on the importations, which in the present case has been nil, but, on the contrary, there has been a great loss, and except the profit made by small dealers on the articles when purchased for consumption, this class of imports has supplied no means of accumulation. The farmers complain of losing capital, the landowners are not gaining it. So far as the manufacture of cotton, wool, silk, &c., has been profitable, it has supplied a means of accumulation; but we are assured by the falling prices, which are always disadvantageous to capitalists and all who have stock on hand to dispose of, and by the low rate of interest—2 or 2½ per cent on good bills—that the profits of manufacturers have not lately been relatively large. The accumulation of capital is slow, therefore, in comparison with the greatly increased consumption by the bulk of the people. Nevertheless enterprise is not checked, and capital is very abundant. New inventions, facilitating production, make less capital necessary to attain a given end. We may infer, therefore, that it is far less the savings of the capitalist than something else, namely, the general increase of knowledge, industry, and skill, which suggests new enterprises and supplies the means for carrying them on.

It is plain from these circumstances, that with the improvement in the physical condition of the people, implied in their larger command of the necessaries of life, and with an enlargement of intellect, there is combined in their possession an increasing means of carrying on enterprise, as the funds subscribed by the engineers and others show, and of raising themselves to the highest level on which any class of society stands. They not only are rising, but are gathering the means of rising faster. While certain vague talkers and vain writers are ranting about the emancipation of industry, and are really reducing it, so far as they can, to the slavery of their own contrivances, its emancipation, in any and every reasonable sense, is going rapidly forward, and is provided for by the necessary progress of wealth.

Another consideration of importance relates to production. We need not insist on the fact that food is necessary to existence; but we must on the assertion of all economists, that the production of food, as of other things, will cease if the producers be not adequately remunerated. It is an essential condition of other classes being fed and clothed, that they fairly remunerate the growers and preparers of food: any want of fair remuneration for them can only be temporary. So far as landowners are necessary to production, they will be well rewarded; but rent is only a sum which remains after all the expense of cultivation is defrayed, and no rent can continue to be paid as the rule till after the actual producer of the food be reimbursed. Landlords, then, must be contented with what they can get after the actual producers are remunerated, and all that remains after remunerating them they will receive. Hence, when remuneration from a monopoly of the supply of food was high, rent rose rapidly; but when the monopoly was done away with, and supplies of food could be obtained from all quarters, the remuneration became less, and rents fell. At present the complaint generally is, that rent has not fallen enough to give a fair remuneration to the actual food-producer.

There is no reason to suppose that the monopoly of the supply of food can ever be restored. It was done away with from stern necessity. At the same time increasing skill and knowledge, and facilities of intercourse, are increasing the supplies that can be obtained at a diminished cost. It is very surprising to notice the extent to which improvements tend to diminish cost. Railways now bring the more remote and most fertile parts of England as near to the metropolis, measuring by time, as places adjacent to it to which rails are not yet made. By the electric telegraph orders are now sent to ships when they arrive at Cowes or Southampton, in a few minutes after their arrival is known, and instead of wasting hours or days they need never come to anchor; and thousands of ships will, in the course of the year, be saved thousands of hours of idleness by the electric telegraph. That is a saving of expense in bringing food from Egypt or Odessa. But the loss of the high remuneration occasioned by the loss of the monopoly cannot ultimately fall on the producers; it must fall on rent; and thus the necessity of remunerating producers is working in the same direction as the increase in the supplies of food, and the increased command they give to the labouring classes over the necessaries of life. It tends to ensure proper rewards for industry, and to make the divergence of classes in point of material enjoyment less and less.

A similar law applies to all intermediate classes not strictly necessary to production. Competition amongst producers will always reduce their rewards to the lowest scale compatible with continuing production. To ensure as much as possible for themselves, they, being a necessity, they will take care to put aside gradually all that are unnecessary. In fair and open and honest competition, such as is now proclaimed and acknowledged to be the just rule for dispensing all rewards—as it has long been the practical rule in the greater part of society—no class of industrious men will long consent to pay another class whose services are not requisite. It is well known that facilities of communication have brought producers and consumers, importers and purchasers, more immediately into contact than formerly; and many commission and other agents are now dispensed with. No class of men can now, therefore, when all the wealth of the world is distributed by exchange, obtain rewards except by making themselves useful to others. In that circumstance we see a provision for a continued and increasing stimulus to production. It brings under subjection many classes who now suppose they are exempt from the necessity of studying the wants and wishes of other men, and promises to increase very much the number of intelligent producers, and enrich and adorn the world to the end of time.

We are aware, of course, of the influence of the principle of population in this matter; but, though the energies of produce live power are only very imperfectly developed, the rate of production, as we see by the declining and continued low prices of almost all things, is keeping, and has kept for some years, ahead of the rate of consumption. When the people were at the very lowest point of degradation they required the assurance of parochial support before they contracted marriage. Now that they are raised above that point, we may suppose that self-respect, prudence, and restraint will have increased power over them. All the world, too, is open to them—industry many parts of it are willing to receive them—every part anxious to supply them with food in exchange for their services; and thus there is both a free scope for the growth of population and a more timely check on its undue increase than ever. The increase of comfort amongst the lower classes, the accumulation of property amongst them, the vast increase of industry without any corresponding increase of capital, seems to indicate in the labourers a growing condition of independence. A slave is a man robbed of half his virtues, and of no virtues is he so certainly robbed as of those of wise restraint and discreet self-control. In proportion, then, as our people become physically well off and personally independent, it may be expected they will practise these virtues. That they have latterly made a great step in this direction is the foundation of our hope that they will go further, and keep population somewhat in the rear of production.

HOW AND WHY COMBINATIONS CANNOT SUCCEED.

THERE is nothing more astonishing in the engineers' dispute than the attempt of one class of workmen to inflict injury on another. The combination called the "Amalgamated Society" claims, like the despotic Governments of the Continent, a power of dictating to the masters how many hours they shall work, and what workmen they shall employ; but it only claims this power for the purpose of keeping some men and boys out of employment, though it inflict distress on them. We could not suppose such a thing possible, were it not stated by the working engineers themselves. Thus, the very first demand made by Messrs. Hibbert and Platt's workmen, sanctioned and negotiated by Mr. Newton, and put into print by themselves, was that they alone should work all the "planing, slotting, and shaping machines," excluding from that work the men previously engaged in it. The Amalgamated Society call themselves legal men, and, confining employment to themselves, lay down the law that only one apprentice shall be taken for every four legal men. They describe the men who work over-time as exercising an "invidious privilege;" it is therefore an advantage: and they object to piece-work, because it enables one man to do additional work while other "legal" men are altogether out of work. All their demands are, in fact, directed against other workmen, whom they would deprive of employment, at the risk of dooming them to destitution. So far as we know, all combinations have had similar unjust objects in view. Though nominally directed against the masters, they have selfishly been intended to benefit the combiners at the expense of their fellow-workmen.

In all combinations the ultimate aimed at has been to get more money for less work. The workmen want more to expend while they have more time to improve themselves. All former attempts of this kind have been failures, and it is not likely the engineers will succeed. A combination to attain such an object is a forcible interference with the laws of supply and demand, and it sets up an artificial regulation in opposition to self-interest. If the practices it is intended to put down were not for the advantage of the parties concerned, there would be no necessity to oppose them. They would not exist. They exist only because they are advantageous. All the masters, all the would-be-apprentices, all the "illegal" men, all those who work over-time and piece-work, are far more numerous than the Amalgamated Society; and success depends on its being able to overrule the laws of supply and demand, and substitute some other rule of conduct than self-interest for all the persons to whom it is opposed. The society avowedly takes the field against "selfishness" or self-interest, and, therefore, we request attention to some well known facts, at variance with its hopes of success.

The continuance of smuggling, in spite of all the efforts of the most powerful governments to prevent it, when they have imposed high duties on commodities, is a notorious fact. The smuggler has not unfrequently been a real benefactor to society, by compelling our statesmen and the statesmen of other countries to yield to the unconquerable force of private interest, and lower or abolish duties on tea, coffee, silks, gloves, ribbons, spirits, &c. If the corrupt rulers of Spain still encourage smuggling, because they share the profits of the contrebandier—of the English Legislature, driven by a sense of duty, some old prejudices, and the distillers, still maintains high duties on brandy, and keeps alive the trade of the smuggler—it is a general rule, that all the Governments of Europe have been compelled in many instances to put an end to high duties from the impossibility of conquering those who found it for their advantage to smuggle; but, while all the legislators of Europe have not been able to control private interest, a few English workmen fancy they can accomplish it by dint of a trade regulation.

It is for the interest of John Clearhead and for the interest of James Skilfulhand to work over-time, and to work piece-work; and for the interest of John Clearhead to employ Bob Clodpole to work a planing-machine instead of Will Ironbrow, who asks more to do the work than Clodpole does, and does it no better. Bill Bounce, however, Harry Meddler, Ned Positive, and others, form themselves into a society, and say:—These things shall not be; they are displeasing to us; and Clearhead shall not employ Clodpole, and Skilfulhand shall not make money by working over-time and piece-work. If these things were not for the mutual advantage of Clearhead, Skilfulhand, and Clodpole, they would no more be undertaken than the importation of tea, brandy, and silk; and the men to whom they are displeasing will no more be able to prevent them, than was Frederick the Great, with a huge army employed as excisemen, to prevent coffee being smuggled into Prussia.

Bill Bounce, Harry Meddler, Ned Positive, and their followers, fancy that their case is different from that of statesmen attempting to conquer selfishness, because they voluntarily enter into this arrangement, pretending that it is for the advantage of Clearhead, Skilfulhand, and Clodpole, as well as for the advantage of Bounce, Meddler, and Co. But they cannot prevent the others from forming a different opinion; and can no more induce all the Clearheads, Skilfulhands, and Clodpoles of the nation to conform to their views, than the English Legislature could persuade the Deal runners to leave off smuggling as long as high duties made it advantageous. The workmen may, like monks, bind themselves to poverty, rags, wooden cribs, hair shirts, and dry crusts; they may persuade Tommy Soft and Nat Unruly that it is very honourable, patriotic, philanthropic, and meritorious to join them. But, beyond all, they can persuade, there will be a great number of Hardheads and Patient-workers who will be to them what smugglers have been to fiscal systems, and make their attempts to coerce others an utter failure. They may run themselves into a narrow form, very different from freedom, but they will be unable to mould other men on their slave pattern.

The only combinations that have ever been temporarily successful have been Governments, or bodies empowered by Governments, to whom the whole people are subjissive; and, though convinced that several acts of the Government are wrong, the mischief of resisting it is so indescribably great compared with the evil of its acts, that they put up with them; and so Government monopolies of all kinds may have a temporary success. Yet, such combinations as that of our landlords, backed by the Legislature, and as that of the shipowners, enforced by long-existing national prejudices, did not succeed in the end, nor were they in the long-run beneficial to the landed proprietors. The legislative [illegible] that the natural means of improving cultivation, and the other natural means of improving navigation, and both lost money, character, and monopoly. Without any similar power to influence legislation so as to make the whole nation submissive to their will, the combined workmen expect to obtain a similar end, and get an increase of wealth, by their own regulations. They constitute a monopoly for themselves, but really operating against themselves. They cannot isolate themselves from society, and cannot alter the laws which regulate the whole; and their restrictions can only impede them in getting work and prevent them from getting money.

It is clear that the combination does not add a farthing to the sum total of wealth; and equally clear, even if it do not diminish it, that it employs a considerable portion of their means in holding public meetings, printing and despatching circulars, and in a variety of modes that are not productive to them. They expect it will yield them more wages and less work hereafter, and they let loose the bird in their hand to get two that are yet in the bush. They take means to lessen the whole sum of wealth, and they can only obtain more than they have by taking some of the diminished amount from other persons. They may not have fair shares—about that we give no opinion: we only assert that combination and trade restriction can neither increase the total nor bring more of it into their pockets.

Their restrictions, whether they concern working over-time, piece-work, taking apprentices, or keeping a particular kind of work in their own hands, operate against themselves. John Clearhead, James Skilfulhand, and Bob Clodpole, who represent the society not submissive to their restrictions, have each and all of them an interest to take a different course from that prescribed. The combiners can neither alter their views nor control their acts. They will carry out their intentions. Clodpole, being ragged and hungry, and having no work, is ready to bind himself an apprentice, or do anything that Clearhead may ask him: Skilfulhand has a family to maintain, or he wishes to get married or work his way in the world; and he and Clearhead carry out their own views, and would find a means of doing so even if the law said they should not, and much more will they succeed when the law is on their side.

By limiting the number of apprentices the combiners exclude many clever young men from the trade. They necessarily limit the talents engaged in it, and do what they can to keep it as backward as a German guild. They do not diminish the quantity of willing labour in the market: they only force it into a less profitable channel, and injure the whole body of labourers. Let them learn more wisdom from literary men. There is no guild of authors, no legal and illegal writers. The craft, without apprenticeship, is open to all. At the same time there is no craft, no art which is less overdone by labourers, and few which are, on the whole, more honoured or better paid. Being free to all, talent finds appropriate and right place; and a Dickens acquires a handsome fortune, and the humblest penny-a-liner obtains a reasonable subsistence. Not to limit apprentices in such a craft as that of engineering is to open it to talent, to ensure its improvement, and gain for it in the end greater respect and greater reward.

What is true of apprentices is equally true of "illegal" men. Some of the most successful engineers—Watt, the elder Stephenson, Brindley—were not bred to the trade. They were illegal men. Amongst the men shut out must necessarily be some men of talent, and they are all forced to take up a less profitable labour. Thus the restriction places labour at a disadvantage in its competition with capital. A more suicidal course for labourers could scarcely be adopted.

Similar remarks apply to over-time and piece-work. The restriction on them is against the workmen. They cannot make as much of their time and labour as they would make. It cuts short the rewards of labour, and prevents labourers saving money and becoming capitalists. We do not say that combinations are criminal, for they break no law; but they are foolish: they are founded on erroneous views of the natural laws which regulate the production and distribution of wealth, of which the workmen prove themselves to be as ignorant as the Legislature when it enacted the Combination Laws.

THE APPROACHING SESSION.

THE Session of Parliament which will be opened next week by the Queen of Great Britain will commence its labours under peculiar if not perilous circumstances. Whether at home or abroad, the "signs of the times" are of a nature to create solicitude. But it is chiefly the events of the Continent, and more especially those which are taking place in that great powder-magazine—the country which is our nearest neighbour—that will excite in the highest degree the earnest attention of men of all parties, and that will render the business of Parliament and the position of the Administration so important on the one hand and so delicate on the other.

The British Parliament is, unfortunately for the great interests of civilisation, the only Parliament in Europe. Everywhere else, with the exception of Belgium and Holland, whose very existence is menaced by the needy adventurer and unscrupulous despot who sits in the Tuileries, and of Denmark, Sweden, and Norway, too remote and weak to be of any influence, the voice of opinion is either stilled or powerless. Anti-English ideas are in the ascendant throughout Europe, and this country stands almost alone in the Old World as the champion and exponent of rational liberty. A soldiery to overcome the people, and a people to submit until they have a chance to throw off the infliction, are the only classes permitted to exist in the most powerful and civilised states of the world; and designs of ambition and extension of territory, or of a military grudge against this country, are those which are most popular with, and most consonant to, the spirit of their warlike and aggressive rulers. Under these circumstances, it is a matter of the highest national importance to consider what is the character and what are the duties and intentions of the men who stand at this moment in the responsible position of the advisers of the British Crown.

The character of the Russell Administration is certainly not of the highest. In losing the services of Lord Palmerston, by far the most popular, and beyond all question the most able, though possibly not the most discreet of his colleagues, Lord John Russell has lost the right hand of his Ministry. With the sole exception of his own name, and that only popular from the remembrance of services rendered twenty years ago, and by no means identified with any recent acts of statesmanship, the Administration does not boast of a single individual whose character, abilities, or achievements are in any degree commanding or even remarkable. In this commercial and industrial country it is of the highest importance that the Financial Minister should be a man of prudence, of business-like talent, and of far-seeing sagacity. In a nation boasting of a greater number of colonies, peopled by a greater diversity of races, than any other nation, either of past or present times, it is equally important that the Colonial Minister should command respect at home, and confidence as well as obedience in those near and remote dependencies of the empire which are entrusted to his care. We need not ask whether Sir Charles Wood and Lord Grey fulfil these conditions. The name of the one is almost synonymous with financial blundering, and of the other with haughty and unreasoning misrule. The Premier himself is respectable and able, but he has ceased to inspire affection or to command confidence; the Home Minister is respectable, and no more; while of the Foreign Minister all that can be said is, that he is a man of the highest promise and a credit to his order; but that, as yet, he has given no proofs that he has energies sufficient for the due and safe performance of the responsible duties of the very high position in which he has been placed. The other members of the Ministry, important as they may be considered as members and connexions of the Grey and Russell families, are of no importance either to the Administration or the country.

So much for the character of the Ministry, which, for the last three years, if not for a longer period, has only existed upon sufferance, and because no other body of statesmen was prepared to step into its place. We have now to consider what we know of the plans and intentions of these gentlemen for conducting the affairs of the country, through the remarkable crisis of European history at which we have now arrived. Of these intentions, with the exception of one, the world is absolutely in the dark. Whether they are on the point of disintegration from disagreement among themselves, or whether they have strengthened their position by the adoption of a line of policy to which they have pledged themselves, are points which none out of their own circle can at present determine. Whether they can carry on the Government by means of the present Parliament, or whether they have made up their minds, if defeated by the Parliament, to appeal to the country, is known but to themselves. All that the country has been permitted to gather of their plans and intentions is, that the Premier stands pledged to introduce a new Reform Bill, and that, if the House of Commons do not pass it, the probabilities are, that the Russell Administration will be forthwith numbered among the things and Ministries that were. We know also that the country is supremely indifferent to the promised Reform Bill, that it has not demanded it with any extraordinary vigour, or taken any particular interest about it, and that it even suspects that the Prime Minister himself more than half regrets that, in a fit of pique at the accidental defeat of his Government in a thin House in the session of 1851, he should have made so rash a promise for the session of 1852.

RECEPTION BY HIS HIGHNESS THE MAHARAJA OF TRAVANCORE, OF THE LETTER OF HER MAJESTY QUEEN VICTORIA.—(SEE NEXT PAGE.)

The attempt to get up a reform cry has proved a signal failure; and although it may by some persons be thought a wise and safe policy to attempt to reform the admitted defects of our representative system, at a time when there is no popular or unnatural excitement upon the subject, it is, at least, somewhat doubtful in the minds of others whose opinions are equally entitled to respectful consideration, whether it is true policy for a Government to volunteer reforms that are not asked for, especially when the anticipated benefits are at best but problematical.

But although the country thus knows but little of the intentions of the Government for the year 1852, and although that little is not of a kind to excite any enthusiasm, it knows something of the duties that devolve upon its rulers at a time like the present. To maintain the honour of England, both at home and abroad; to tranquillize the well-founded apprehensions of the country, by placing it in a position not only to repel attack, but to prevent it by a preliminary display of strength, confidence, and self-reliance; in the midst of all undoubted peril, and of all possible treachery, to maintain inviolate the liberties of Englishmen, and the sanctity of the British soil; to call forth the warlike energy of the people whenever and wherever a display of it may be needed; and to do all this without impairing the national resources, or imposing unwise or unnecessary burthens upon the backs of the industrious—these are a few of the duties that devolve upon any Administration that, at a juncture like this, expects to retain or acquire the support of public opinion, and the gratitude of the present or a future generation. It is just possible that the members of the Russell Administration are aware of these duties, and equal to the discharge of them. It is to be hoped that they are, because changes of Ministry and dissolution of Parliament are inconvenient, to say the least of them, at such a time, and under such circumstances. But, whatever may be the intentions or the fate of the Administration, the sentiments, opinions, and energies of the people are such as ought to, and must, inspire any Government with zeal and confidence. In this country the war of contending factions has all but ceased, and would cease as entirely as is consistent with a representative form of government at the first prospect of any real aggression upon the honour or security of the nation. But, something better and more tangible than Reform Bills is just now expected. The country will not object to a Reform Bill if prudently and effectively set forth; but it will object, if nothing but a barren Reform Bill be offered to it. The present is no time for doctrinaire abstraction and legislative trifling, but for serious and urgent business; and any Ministry that will zealously and wisely set about it, even although every individual member of it should be a Grey or a Russell, would deserve and receive public support. As we have said before, it is possible that the present Government fully understands what is expected of it, and is as fully competent and prepared to do it. We sincerely hope that it may prove so, and that Lord John Russell and his colleagues may make amends for the lazy indifference and discreditable bungling of the past by zeal that shall not outrun discretion, and by discretion and judgment that shall leave nothing unprovided for, and that shall only undertake what can be well and thoroughly accomplished.

STATE RECEPTION AT TRIVANDRUM, THE CAPITAL OF TRAVANCORE.

THE interesting pageant pictured upon the preceding page is illustrative of Eastern ceremonials, and is also associated with our Great Exhibition of 1851. It represents the Court of his Royal Highness the Maharaja of Travancore, assembled in its utmost magnificence to do honour to a most important occasion —the reception (on the 27th of November last) by his Highness of an autograph letter of Queen Victoria, conveying to his Highness her Majesty's most gracious acceptance of the very superb carved ivory chair, or throne, which was exhibited by her Majesty in the Crystal Palace, and formed one of our Engravings in the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS for Sept. 6 (page 293).

The present Sketch is curious, as being descriptive of the gorgeous display observed in the East on such occasions; whilst it record the high sense entertained by the Eastern Sovereign of her Majesty's friendly and courteous act on this memorable occasion, it being an unusual mark of Royal consideration.

The Court of Travancore, however, it is well known, has long been perhaps the most loyal of our Eastern allies, although its independency of action has been marked by the very high degree of intelligence, of European tastes and accomplishments, attained by the late and the present rulers.

A Correspondent on the spot describes as the most magnificent display of "cloth of gold" and jewels; of state elephants and gilded howdahs, of cameleopards, of tamed tigers, and rhinoceri, as well as troops of the line and cavalry, which escorted the valued document (the entire distance (two miles) from the British Residency to the Palace, and peals of artillery shook the old fort to its foundations, as General Cullen placed the same in his Highness' eager hands.

A grand banquet at the Residency, a nautch and fireworks at the Palace, in which loyal and appropriate mottoes, complimentary to her Majesty and the Prince Consort, were conspicuous, terminated this (to the capital of Travancore) most auspicious day; which, in the event, we are informed, is to be still more permanently perpetuated by a costly work of art from the pencil of an artist (Mr Lewis), already well known by his Eastern productions, to appear in due time in England for exhibition and engraving.

THE NEW FRENCH MINISTERS.

M. Fialin de Persigny, the presiding spirit of the new Ministry, has been long quoted as the completest representative of the Idées Napoléoniennes, the Idées Actuelles of the President, his shadow, and the strongest administrative his court intimate counsel or. Whatever Ministers were in office, the influence of M. de Persigny was behind the curtain. Born in 1810, he became a pupil of the School of Saumur, and entered in 1829 the 4th Regiment of Hussars. Having retired from the army, he founded in 1833 the Revue de l'Occident Français, in which he published an elaborate examination of the Imperial system. This publication first introduced him to the notice of Louis Napoleon, with whom he formed henceforth the closest ties of intimacy. M. Fialin figured among the most sanguine adventurers in the expeditions at Strasbourg and Boulogne. In the latter he was taken prisoner, was brought before the Court of Peers, and condemned to twenty years of imprisonment. He had already suffered more than a third of his term of captivity in the prison of Doullens, when he was released by the Revolution of February. It must be said by us that M. de Persigny has not shown much gratitude to his great liberator; Bonapartism, of which he is the organ, having been one long campaign against the men and institutions of 1848. M. de Persigny's diplomatic missions to Berlin and other Courts are too well known to need further mention here. Meantime, it will be important to remember that this confidant of the President recently undertook a journey to Brussels, for the sake of bringing some pressure to bear upon measures for the expulsion or rigorous treatment of refugees, and for the coercion of the press. No one has been astonished, although many have been grieved, at the tame compliance of the Belgian Government with the dictates of the Tuileries. The expulsion of M. Carnot, of Alexandre Thomas, and several other estimable men, and the violence al owed towards the exiles liberated from Ham w[illegible] its goal territory, are sufficient evidence that the independence of the country is gone. M. de Persigny, it is thought, will soon succeed to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. It is to be hoped that his administration will be such as to give no colour to a fear very widely felt, and that the absorption of Belgium may not, like the confiscation of the Orleans property, be proclaimed to the world by a decree.

M. Abbatucci, the new Minister of Justice, has always been one of the leading advisers of Louis Napoleon. Until the appointment of his name to the same Ministry with M. de Persigny he was esteemed one of the moderate party. Under the monarchy of July he was a member of the Chamber of Deputies and a Judge of the Court of Appeal at Orleans. After the revolution of February he became a Judge of the Court of Cassation and representative of the Lot [illegible] both Assemblies he was dumb, and is, therefore, consistently an [illegible] parliamentary nullity. He is called M. Abbatucci Jer, to distinguish him from his son, the representative of Corsica, to which island his family belongs.

M. Bineau, the new Minister of Finance, was, as you are aware, Minister of Public Works in the Ministry of Mm. Barrot and Fould. For the latter department he was not ill calculated, having been formerly head engineer of mines, and of diligent, business like habits.

The "new and simple soi-disant" M. de Morny calls it in his circular, does not admit of discussion. The Ministers will learn, the President will through his Minister of State, who is charged with precisely the same functions "at were discharged by Maret, Duke of Bassano, under the Emperor M. Xavier de Casabianca, to whom this post is confided, was formerly the advocate of the claims of the Bonaparte family, and probably suggested some of the chicaning considerations upon which the decrees of yesterday were founded.

M. de Persigny has appointed as his chef du cabinet M. Théophile de Montour formerly one of the editorial staff of the Pairie, then Redacteur of the [illegible] and now of the Peuple, the halfpenny newspaper recently set up. Daily News.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

The decree of the President of the Republic confiscating the property of the Orleans family, the purport of which we gave in our late edition of last week, has produced so painful a sensation in the public mind, that an announcement in the Constitutionnel of Wednesday, to the effect that the decree in question would be referred for final consideration to the Senate and Legislative Body, was received with great satisfaction by almost all circles, without exception, in Paris. An official note, however, communicated from the Government to the newspapers, has effectually dispelled all the hopes which the Constitutionnel had thus called into existence, for the communication states the announcement of that journal to be wholly without foundation, and that the decree is final. By this measure it is decreed that the members of the Orleans family, their husbands and consorts, and descendants, cannot possess any property (moveable or immoveable) in France. They are bound to sell them within the year, and in default they will be sold by the domain. Another decree cancels the donation of his private property made by Louis Philippe on the 7th August to his children, and enacts that their properties, of about two hundred millions of francs, shall be employed as follows:—Ten millions to societies of secours mutuels. Ten millions to the improvement of the lodgings for the working classes. Ten millions to the establishment of a fund for granting loans on mortgage in the departments. Five millions to a benefit fund for the poorer clergy. All the officers, sub-officers, and soldiers on active service will receive, according to their rank in the Legion of Honour, as follows; viz. the Legionary, 250 francs; the Officers, 500 francs; Commanders, 1000 francs; Grand Officers, 2000 francs; Grand Crosses, 3,000 francs.

Messrs. de Morny, Fould, and others of the Ministers, having refused to concur in this confiscation of the Orleans property, have resigned, and the Ministry, which had been re-modelled and re-organised (a new "Ministry of State" and a "Ministry of Police" having been created), now consists of the following members; viz. MM. Abbatucci, Justice; de Persigny, Interior, Agriculture, and Commerce; Bineau, Finances; de Saint Arnaud, War; Ducos, Marine; Turgot, Foreign Affairs; Fortoul, Public Instruction and Worship; De Maupas, Police; Casabianca, State; Lefebvre Duruflé, Public Works.

The confiscation decree has called forth spirited protests from M. de Montalembert and M. Dupin, the eminent lawyer and President of the late Legislative Assembly. The former, together with MM. Merode, de Mcremart, de Mousnier, de Girardin, André, Mathieu, Baudet, Desrobert, and Hallez Chapared, have refused to countenance a Government which could be guilty of such a measure, and have accordingly tendered their resignations as members of the Consultative Commission. M. Dupin, also, has resigned his post of Procureur-General of the Court of Cassation, which high office he has filled for twenty-two years.

The following are the letters of MM. Montalembert and Dupin. They first appeared in the London papers, the Paris journals not being allowed to publish them:—

Paris, Jan. 23, 1852.

M. le Ministre,—In consequence of the decrees which appeared this morning, I consider myself called upon to perform an imperative duty; and I beg you accordingly to be good enough to present, for the acceptance of the President of the Republic, my resignation of the functions of member of the Consultative Commission, created on the 3rd of December last. Though that Commission has not been consulted on any of the acts of the Executive, there does not the less exist, in the eyes of the public, for those who compose it, a species of solidarité with the policy of the Government, which it has become impossible for me hereforth to accept. I appeal to your honour, M. le Ministre, and, in case of necessity, to that of Prince Louis Napoleon himself, to make my resignation public through the same channel as my nomination—that is, by its insertion in the Moniteur.

To M. de Casablanca, Minister of State. CH. DE MONTALEMBERT.

To the President of the Republic.

I regret exceedingly, that, previous to the publication of the decree which I have read this morning in the Moniteur, you had not heard my opinion with the same kindness you have sometimes manifested towards me. I should have tried to demonstrate to you, not merely in the private interest of the children, the greater part of whom, I know, are innocent, but in the interest of testamentary executors, but in the interest of your own government, that those who have suggested that measure are not acquainted with the facts, and that they have disregarded all the rules of law and equity. In fact, there is no extraordinary situation (at least to the extent of half) in the estimate made of the property of the Orleans family. In law the decree violates in its essence the very principle of property. This right of property was recognised, after a solemn discussion, in the person of the late King, by the 22d and 23d articles of the law of the 2d of March, 1832; and in the person of his children by the very acts of the revolution of February, by the decree of the Constituent Assembly of the 26th of October, 1848, and by all the successive Assembly of the 15th of January, 1850, promulgated by your Government, and authorised the loan of 20,000 000f on that property by your Minister of Finance. Thus, public right, will, specia laws, contracts and decrees in the person of the Orleans family, the Orleans their right to the property which the decree of the 22d of January deprives them of all at once, and in a manner so absolute that the sacred rights of the tomb, the hereditary rights of parents, are not even excepted. If the Constitution of the 15th of January was in vigour, the Senate might be appealed to in virtue of the 26th article, which permits that body "to make opposition to the promulgation of laws which are contrary to the inviolable character of property." In the present state of things, the only resource is to appeal to you, Prince, and to invoke your wisdom and the magnanimity of your own feelings when they are again consulted and more deliberately entered on. But, if these rigorous measures are to be maintained, a great scruple arises from the depth of my conscience. As Procureur-General to the Court of Cassation for nearly twenty-two years; as the principal organ of the law in that high branch of jurisdiction; charged as I am by the Government to proclaim the constant respect to right, and to require the reversal and the annulling of the acts which violate the laws, or which constitute the incompetence or the excesses of the Government—how shall I be able henceforth to exercise the same firmness if acts are introduced in our legislation which are in contradiction with those principles? I feel myself bound, therefore, to request you, Prince President, to relieve me from my duties. But I owe it to myself to explain myself in a manner, and to mislead as much as I individually could, the legal and moral doctrines on which the essential order of civilised society reposes. After the coup d'état of the 2d of December, against which it became my duty to protest, I have awaited the judgment of the people appealed to by you. After that solemn judgment I adhered frankly to the immense powers which were the result of that appeal considering them as the strongest guarantee that could be procured for peace or re-establish those principles which a wild Socialism had endangered and menaced, and, as a public functionary, my co-operation was loyally given to you. But, at the present moment, and on a question of civil right, and of private property, of natural equity, and of all Christian notions of what is just and unjust, and which I cherish in my soul for more than fifty years as jurisconsulte and as magistrate, I feel myself absolutely called on to resign my functions of Procureur-General.

Be pleased, Prince, to accept the expression of my sentiments and respectful consideration.

In the early part of the week the uneasiness of the public mind was so great, in consequence of what all classes concurred in regarding as an attack upon private property, very Communist in its character, that the Moniteur published the following notice to allay any further apprehensions:—

The Government cannot refute all the rumours which malevolence does not cease to circulate. The rigorous measures which have been imposed by necessity have naturally made an impression on public opinion, which every day weakens; but the Government will be obliged to take new and more severe measures. The state of the country is far from justifying such fears. Without in any way abandoning the measures of precaution which it considers useful, the Government will have no occasion for the future for exceptional measures, and the normal action of the political bodies, of which the organisation is advancing rapidly, will suffice to consolidate the work of the 2d of December.

The week has been fruitful in organic laws. On Monday the Moniteur published the organic decree of the Council of State, which is divided into two sections. M. Baroche is appointed Vice-President, and is to preside in the absence of the President of the Republic; M. Maillard is named President of the Committee of Debate on the Bonfires of Orders of Justice, and Foreign Affairs, M. Delangle; of the Interior, Public Instruction, and Pub lo Worship; M. Parieu, Finances; M. Magne, Public Works; [illegible] Lebrun; Marine, [illegible]. There are in all 24 Councillors of State, viz. MM. Boulay de la Meurthe, de Thorigny, Waisse, and Lutin included. There are to be 20 Masters of Requests of the first class, and 20 of the second; 16 Auditors of the first class, and 16 of the second. The salaries of the members of the Council of State are to be as follows:—The Vice-President receives a sum of 80,000f.; Presidents of Sections, each 50,000f.; the Councillors of State, 25,000f.; Masters of Requests of the first class, 16,000f., Masters of Requests of the second class, 12,000f.; Auditors of the first class, 5,000f., the Secretary-General of the Council, 15,000f.; the Auditors of second class receive no salary.

On Tuesday the constitution of the Senate was promulgated. Its members are 72 in number, and include the following names:—

General Arbaud, ex-member of the Legislative Assembly; Count d'Argout, formerly Minister of Finance, Governor of the Bank of France; the Marquis d'Audiffret, President of the Court of Accounts; General de Bar, ex-member of the Legislative Assembly, General Baraguay d'Hilliers, formerly ambassador, ex-member of the Legislative Assembly; M. de Beaumont (de la Somme), ex-member of the Legislative Assembly; Prince de Beauvau, ex peer of France; the Marquis de Boissel, formerly first president of the Court of Appeal at Lyons; the Charles Berthier, Prince de Wagram; M. Boulay (de la Meurthe), ex-Vice-President of the Republic, Count de Bretteuil, ex-peer of France; M. de Cambacères, sen., ex-peer of France; Count de Castellane, General-in-Chief of the army of Lyons; Admiral Cacy, member of the Council of Admiralty; Count de Caumont-Laforce; M. François Clary; the Marquis de Croi; Baron de Crouseilles, formerly Minister of Public Instruction, ex-member of the Legislative Assembly, Count Curial, ex-member of the Legislative Assembly; M. Dronyn de Lhuys, formerly Minister of Foreign Affairs, ex-member of the Legislative Assembly; M. Dumas, formerly Minister of Agriculture and Commerce, member of the Institute; M. Charles Dupin, member of the Institute, ex-member of the Legislative Assembly; General Count d'Hautpoul, formerly Minister of War, ex-member of the Legislative Assembly; Admiral Hugon; General Husson, ex-member of the Legislative Assembly; M. Lacrosse, formerly Minister of Public Works, ex member of the Legislative Assembly; General de la Hitte, formerly Minister of Foreign Affairs, grand officer of the Commission of Artillery; General Count de Lawestine, Commander-in-Chief of the National Guard of Paris.

Besides the seventy-two senators named, all marshals of France and cardinals, who are Frenchmen, and members of the episcopal bench in France, are ex-officio senators. The list published contains 18 generals, 9 vice-admirals, 14 ex-ministers, and 3 judges; the rest are ex-peers of France and ex-representatives. It is remarked, however, that among them there is not one who has rendered himself illustrious as a statesman, or whose name would be naturally looked for in such a body. The list includes, however, the name of M. Thibaudeau, ex Counsellor of State of the Empire. This M. Thibaudeau is one of the Conventionists of the Great Revolution, and is the last, or nearly the last, survivor of the regicides. He voted for the death of Louis XVI.!

The officers of the Senate are as follows. Their names were made known on Thursday, viz. Prince Jerome Bonaparte, Grand Marshal of France, President of the Senate; M. Meynard, Senator, First Vice-President; Vice-Presidents, MM. Drouyn de Lhuys, Troplong, and General Baraguay d'Hilliers; General d'Hautpoul, Grand Referendary; M. Lacrosse, Secretary; MM. Maillard, Bonjean, Magne, Admiral Leblanc, and M. de Parieu are appointed Presidents of the six sections of the Council.

The Consultative Commission has been dissolved.

The Courrier de Marseille announces the arrival in that city of M. Antoine Bonaparte, en route for Italy, where he is charged with a special mission by the Government of Prince Louis Napoleon.

A part of the political prisoners in the prisons of Bordeaux were embarked on board a steamer on Sunday last, and taken to Blaye, where they will be joined by a band which has been brought from Agen. Those who have now left Bordeaux are about fifty in number, and are principally agricultural labourers from the department of the Lot et Garonne. Among them are also an avocat, a landowner who is said to be rich, a huissier, and a printer.

The Messager des Chambres of Brussels contradicts a report that M. de Girardin, Schœlcher, Versigny, and Bancel were about to publish there a journal, called the Bien-Etre Universel, which had existed for some time in Paris, and that M. Victor Hugo and Madame de Dudevant (Georges Sand) were to be the principal editors.

UNITED STATES.

Intelligence from New York, dated the 17th inst., announces a diplomatic misunderstanding between the Austrian Minister at Washington and the Honourable Mr. Webster, one of the Secretaries of State. The former gentleman had taken exception to the tone and sentiments conveyed in Mr. Webster's speech at the congressional banquet to Kossuth, and had considered it necessary to remonstrate to the President of the United States on the subject. Mr. Webster's reply had not yet made its appearance; but it was generally supposed that the Austrian diplomatist, Chevalier Hulsemann, would be handed his passports.

Kossuth had left Washington for the western states, and arrived at the capital of Pennsylvania, where he was received with immense applause.

A despatch received by Mr. Secretary Webster from Mr. Lawrence, the United States Minister at the British Court, contradicts the report that Lord Palmerston had communicated with the American Government regarding the firing into the Prometheus by the brig of war Express; but states that he had had a letter of Mr. Webster upon the subject before Lord Palmerston, who had not had time, however, to give it his attention before surrendering the seals of office to his successor. Mr. Lawrence adds, that he has received assurances from Lord Granville of his most friendly disposition, and that the subject in question would receive his prompt attention. The despatch also states that the private claims of American citizens before the Foreign-office would receive the early attention of the British Government.

A bill having for its object to facilitate the establishment of a line of steam-vessels between New York and the west coast of Ireland has been laid before Congress.

The general features of the miscellaneous news in the New York papers are eminently characteristic—violent snow-storms, steamer explosions, out-of-the-way methods of murder, loss of life from false alarm of fire, destructive hurricanes, intense cold in all quarters, navigation stopped by ice, &c. From the details of those respective disasters we learn that thirteen persons were killed, and several others wounded, by the explosion of the steamer Mercedita, near Macon, Ga.; that a girl named Sarah Gerber was convicted, in Philadelphia, of having caused the death of an infant, by compelling it to swallow pins and needles; the prisoner, who is only thirteen years of age, was found guilty of murder in the second degree, and will be sent to the Penitentiary: that the false alarm of fire was in an emigrants' home at New York, and that the number of lives lost in the rush to escape was six, while several were wounded and crushed severely; and, with respect to the weather, that the snow-storms had been experienced at the very remote points from each other of Buffalo and New Orleans; while the whole state of Louisiana had been visited by a hurricane, which did immense damage to life and property. The Hudson river is closed with ice, and the railroad between New York and Albany is doing an enormous traffic. Lola Montes has written a vindication of her life and character.

From California there are advices to the 16th of December. The news from the mines is favourable. Two arrivals of gold dust, one amounting to 600,000 dollars, the other to 1,400,000 dollars, had been announced at New York from San Francisco. Governor M'Dougal had issued a proclamation ordering a mil tary expedition against the Indians.

From Central America it is announced that Munoz was still at Ibeity and that Walker and the Costa Caravajal had met with some repulses in Mexico, but no positive defeat.

We have news from Jamaica, by this arrival, to the 7th inst. The cholera prevails to a fatal extent at Savannah la Mar; one or two cases also had occurred at Kingston.

INDIA.

Intelligence to the 3d inst. has been received this week by electric telegraph, in anticipation of the overland mail, from Bombay. It is to the following effect:—

Dost Mohammed's health is re-established.

Sir C. Campbell's forces had not yet returned. Some skirmishing had taken place, and one affair with cavalry near Derra Gazee Khan. Troops of Upper Scinde were going to Beypour, and a reserve was forming at Hyderabad.

The Nizam had only paid £20,000 on account of the £400,000 due, and cannot procure a greater sum. His domains were in a state of anarchy, as also those of Oude.

A naval force had been collected at Rangoon.

ACADEMY OF SCIENCES IN PARIS.—Lord Brougham on Monday read at the academy, before a most crowded audience, a paper on the optical and mathematical inquiries which have occupied his time during his late residence at Cannes. His Lordship accompanied the reading of this memoir with numerous demonstrations on the subject, which occupied an hour occupied the attention of his hearers. MM Arago, Biot, and Tenard, and other eminent scientific men, were present, and appeared deeply interested in the explanations of their learned confrère.

M. THIERS AND THE PRINCE PRESIDENT.—Some of our contemporaries have published the following, but we do not vouch for its accuracy: "M. Thiers having applied to be allowed to return to France, offering to abstain from politics, 'Give me the fourth volume of the History of the Revolution, by M. Thiers,' said the President of the Republic. On the book being brought, he pointed to a passage in which M. Thiers reproaches the Emperor for not having expelled from France, as a measure of necessity, several of his political adversaries. 'Copy that,' said Louis Napoleon, 'and send it to him as an answer to his application.'

THE PROPERTY OF THE HOUSE OF ORLEANS.

The decree of the President of the French Republic, which arbitrarily strips the Orleans family of a large portion of its fortune, will not fail to arouse the indignation of every honest mind. This act of spoliation, from which the Provisional Government of 1848 had shrunk, even in moments of the greatest financial embarrassments, has just been consummated by a power which affected to make a stand against rampant Socialism, and to be the firmest supporter of the social rights and of property. As to the motives which have induced the wicked author to disgorge from the Princes of Orleans of a portion of their patrimony, nobody will be deceived: there can be no illusion as to the considerations of public interest on which the decree is based; and everybody can read them clearly, despite the fiasco of sophisms with which it is sought to justify a fact which on all hands must be only prompted by resentment and personal apprehension. Let us broadly declare that the decree will remain a monument of the most monstrous iniquity, and of an abuse of authority which has no parallel except in the bad epoch of 1793; that is to say, at a period when the most sacred laws of society could be violated with impunity.

During the reign of Louis Philippe, the unquestionably very considerable fortune of the Orleans family was much exaggerated, and this exaggeration exactly suited the purpose of those who represented the person of Monarch with economy. It will be easy to prove this by the estimate which we are about to submit of the property of the House of Orleans, and to show how chimerical, or at least ill-founded, are the fears which the President of the French republic appears to entertain, as to the influence which the possession of estates can give to the exiled Princes, mistakenly valued at 300,000,000 francs (£12,000,000).

During the reign of Louis Philippe his revenues were thus fixed:—

	Francs.
Civil List	12,000,000
Estates of the Crown—comprising the Louvre, the Tuileries, Versailles, Fontainebleau, Compiègne, St. Cloud, Meudon, St. Germain, the Forests of Sénart, of Bricon, of St. Germain, &c., of which the rents are valued at	3,500,000
Appanage of the Duke of Orleans (lands set apart for the maintenance of younger children), the benefit of which had been left to the King, and which was valued at 100,000,000 francs, yielding an annual of	2,500,000
Private property (domaine privé) of the King, castles, lands, forests, and valued at the sum of 104,000,000 francs, a rental of	3,000,000
Shares, stocks, and all employed money, valued at 90,000,000, yielding an income of	4,000,000
Giving a total of £1,000,000 sterling, or	25,000,000

We have given the general income in order to show that it is not on a rental, relatively so small, that Louis Philippe—after having paid the household expenses of his family, the state outlay to keep up the proper dignity of royalty, and all the charges which he took upon himself for the civil residences, the museum, and royal manufactures, such as those of Sèvres, the Gobelins (tapestry), and Beauvais, which produce nothing—could make savings, as has been so often asserted from personal knowledge.

When Louis Philippe ascended the throne, he made a gift to his children of his patrimonial property. The ancient French law prescribed that all the estates of the person called to the throne became incorporate with the domain of the State; but it must be remarked that it is not by virtue of this law that Louis Philippe was called upon to reign, but by virtue of a new law, sprung from a revolution. Consequently, the dispositions of the old law could not be in any manner applied to him. Moreover, a later law had sanctioned, at the date of March 2nd, 1832, the use which the King had made of his personal fortune, and reserved to him the entire disposal, under conditions specified in the donation made to his children, and according to the terms of which he kept for himself only the enjoyment of the profits (usufruit), the original property in which he abandoned to the Princes his sons.

The decree of which we have spoken strikes at the distribution of that donation, which it annuls somewhat too late as we have shown, inasmuch as it received the sanction of the law, and that it is, in fact, in some degree proceeded by its decisions. The decree disputes the validity of the donation in the name of the interests of the nation which consented to it by the representatives at another epoch, and represents it as fraudulent. We have indicated that it was sanctioned by legislative enactment. We would add, that it is an insult to equity and common sense to invoke a law of state, in order to rob the Princes of Orleans of what is not applicable to them, because, having been passed under the sway of the principle of hereditary monarchy, it could not even admit a new right, contrary to its principle, the right of Louis Philippe to reign. It is, then, to the private domain of the former King that the decree applies, for, as to the estates which formed the ancient appanage of the House of Orleans, they have followed the lot of those which composed the dotation of the Crown: they have returned to the State. We will give here a statement of this particular property.

The real estates of the private domain consist in the residences of Neuilly, of Eu, of Dreux, of La Ferté-Vidame, and of Dreux. Besides the farms and lands attached to these residences, the private property includes the farms and lands, in all about 430,000 acres of forest, in the following departments:—Ardennes, Eure, Eure-et-Loire, Haute-Marne, indre et Loire, Loire-et-Cher, Loiret, Marne, Seine, Seine-Inférieure, Oise, and Somme. The value of these lands altogether is estimated at the sum of 104,000,000 francs, to which must be added, as we have already stated, 90,000,000 in capital or shares of the Canals of Loing and of Orleans. The furniture and objects of art having belonged to the Crown of Orleans, and of which the greatest part is now sold, may represent about a million of francs, on the account of the piece lation which this property suffered from the forced sales which were made, for the most part, at a time when it was worth 200,000,000, or nearly £8,000,000. The entire fortune of Louis Philippe, having been placed under sequestration, has remained in the hands of the French Government; but the entire public indisputably does not represent, by a great deal, the exact amount of the real property of the late King. Near.y 40,000,000f. of admitted debts must be deducted from it, and which are guaranteed by the private property, which, at first, to the amount of 150,000,000f., was declared by the executors to observe, next, that the estimates we have given were made at a time when landed property had a greater value than it has now in France. According to the scale of depreciation observed, it is not too much to say, that we affirm that the private domain does not represent, in reality, at this moment, a much higher value than 100,000,000f., or £4,000,000 sterling.

The sovereign, divided amongst the children of the ex-King, with the exception of the Count of Paris, who is excluded, as the son of the Duke of Orleans, the elder of the family, and from the donation, would give to each of the children a fortune of nearly 15,000,000 to 16,000,000 francs; and it is consequently a little sum that each of the Princes of Orleans loses through the President's decree. The personal fortune of the members of the Royal family will be remarkably reduced by the confiscation. It is known, in fact, that, with the exception of the Duc d'Aumale, who has alone inherited immense property from the Prince of Condé, the income of which is 4,000,000 francs, there remains to the other children of Louis Philippe only the fortune of their aunt, the late Mme. Adelaïde, amounting to 20,000,000 francs, yielding a rental of scarcely 4,000,000. It is the property coming from that succession which a second decree of the President prescribes to the Princes to sell within a year.

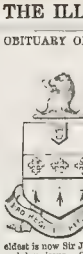
Let us remark, in conclusion, to show the inconsistency of the decree which denies the Princes of Orleans of the possession of a private domain, that a Senatus-consulte of the year 10 of the Republic had admitted in favour of the Emperor Napoleon the formation of a private domain, besides an extraordinary domain, composed of the property taken in the war, which amounted to 1,900,000,000 francs, and which was left at the Emperor's disposal.

In respect to the sense of fitness and delicacy of the decree, it will suffice to call to mind, that in 1847 Louis Philippe gave orders to his Ministers to demand from the Chambers an annual credit of 150,000 francs, to constitute a pension for Prince Jerome, formerly King of Westphalia, and brother of the President, to revert in part to his son Jerome Napoleon. More than this, the personal munificence of the King had already protected another Bonaparte. A young member of the Emperor's family travelling in Belgium, was arrested for his friends, being pressed by his creditors and on the point of being incarcerated for debt, having made known to Louis Philippe his embarrassments, the Royal Treasury soon saved the liberty of the nephew of the Emperor.

EMIGRATION FROM THE UNITED KINGDOM.—A Parliamentary paper, printed on Wednesday, contains a return of the total number of persons who have emigrated from the United Kingdom to British possessions or to foreign countries from 1846 to 1850 inclusive. It appears that the total number of emigrants during the five years was 1,316,567. Of these, 53,424 were despatched by the Colonial Land and Emigration Commissioners, leaving 1,163,142 as the number which have actually emigrated at their own expense. The number of adults who embarked from Deptford was 22,600, and from Plymouth 29 338. The expense of conveying emigrants sent for embarkation from London within the same period amounted to £8634 14s. 4d., and from London to Plymouth £32 1s. 6d.

DEATH OF AN ECCENTRIC LITERARY CHARACTER.—On Wednesday an inquest was held at Camberwell on the body of Mr. Richard Alfred Davenport, aged 75, an historian of America and India, and a voluminous author. On Sunday, about four o'clock, the attention of police-constable Dyer was attracted by low moans issuing from Brunswick Cottage, Park street, Camberwell (the residence of the deceased). He knocked at the door, but could obtain no answer, and he, therefore, broke into the front parlour, and found the deceased lying in the passage nearly dead, with a bottle that had contained laudanum in his hand. A surgeon was sent for, but a few minutes after his arrival the deceased expired. Several bottles were found in his bed-room containing laudanum, of which he was in the constant habit of taking large quantities while writing. Upon the jury going to view the body, the house presented a most extraordinary appearance: the rooms were literally crammed with books, manuscripts, pictures, ancient coins, and antiques of various descriptions. The deceased has resided in the house for upwards of eleven years, during which time it had never been cleansed; and the books, beds, and furniture were rapidly decaying, everything being covered with dust. The windows of the house (of which the deceased was the freeholder) were all broken, the whole place presenting a most dilapidated appearance. Verdict—"That the deceased died from inadvertently taking an overdose of opium."

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.



SIR JOHN DEAN PAUL, BART.

THIS venerable Baronet died at his seat, the Hill House, Stroud, on the 16th inst., in the 77th year of his age. Sir John was elder son of the late John Paul, M.D., of Salisbury, by Frances his wife, daughter of John Snow, Esq., of Hendon, banker in London; and grandson of Dean Paul, Esq., brother of Sir Gunning Paul, Bart., of Bristol and Portbury, county of Gloucester. He was himself created a Baronet 3rd Sept., 1821. He married, first, 2nd April, 1799, Frances Eleanor, daughter of Charles Sampson, Esq., of Bradley Hall, Durham, by Anne his wife, daughter of Thomas, eighth Earl of Strathmore; secondly, in 1835, Mary, widow of Berkeley Napier, Esq., of Pennard House, county Somerset, and thirdly, in 1844, Elizabeth, youngest daughter of Dr. Horsley, Bishop of St. Asaph. By his first wife only had he issue: by her, who died 15th April, 1833, he had three sons and four daughters. Of the former, the eldest is now Sir John Dean Paul, second Baronet: he has been twice married, and has issue. Of the daughters, the youngest, Jane, is the wife of Edward Fox Fitzgerald, Esq., only son of the late amiable and ill-fated Lord Edward Fitzgerald.

SIR WILLIAM OGLANDER, BART.

THE death of this gentleman occurred on the 17th inst. well, late of Wight, ever since the Norman Conquest their Dorsetshire seat of Parnham was acquired by the marriage, in 1661, of Sir William Oglander, third Baronet, of Nunwell, with Elizabeth, daughter and sole heir of Sir John Strode. The sixth Baronet, the gentleman whose death we record, was born 13th September, 1769, and married, 24th May, 1810, Maria Ann, eldest daughter of George Henry Duke of Grafton, by whom he had two sons and one daughter. Of the former, the elder and only survivor, the present Sir Henry Oglander, Bart., was born 24th June, 1811, and is married to Louisa, youngest daughter of the late Sir George William Leeds Fitzgerald.

ARCHDEACON BERNERS.

THE Venerable HENRY DENNY BERNERS, of Woolverstone Park, county of Suffolk, representative of the ancient family of Berners, one of Norman origin, was the second son of Charles Berners, Esq., by his wife Katherine, daughter of John Larcche, Esq., of Egham, M.P. for Bodmin, and was born in 1760. Having entered into holy orders he became Archdeacon of Suffolk, and was most popular in that county from his private and public worth. To his numerous tenantry in Woolverstone, Erwarton, and Harkstead, Suffolk, his kindness and liberality were unbounded. As an instance of the charity of his nature, it may be mentioned it was his custom to allow his labourers never (or but in the severest) winters to apply to their benevolent master to be relieved with coals, and should mitigate the rigour of all who knew him, and say daily of all who lived near or under him, died after a few days' illness on the 29th instant, at his seat, Woolverstone Park. The Archdeacon was in the commission of the peace for the county. His youngest brother, who died in 1831, was the eminent London banker, William Berners. Berners-street, Oxford-street, takes its name, as part of their property, from the family of Berners.

FREDERICK RICCI.

THIS Italian composer, who was rising into reputation, was the brother of Louis Ricci, the well-known author of "Una Aventura di Scaramuccia," and many other comic operas. The young death of Frederick Ricci, in the flower of his age and talent, was of a melancholy nature: he was struck with a fatal blow of apoplexy while travelling in a post-chaise from Warsaw to St. Petersburg.

GENERAL SIR LEWIS GRANT, K.C.H.

THIS gallant officer entered the British army as an Ensign in the 98th Foot; he served under Sir Ralph Abercromby at St. Vincent's, and was for some time actively employed in Martinico, Barbadoes, and other West India colonies. He commanded the 78th Highlanders in the Walcheren expedition, and knighted in 1831. In 1830 he was appointed governor of the Bahama Islands, and knighted in 1831. He became a Lieutenant-General in 1837, and obtained the colonelcy of the 90th Foot in 1835. Sir Lewis died at Brighton on the 16th inst., of a disease of the heart, whilst journeying in an omnibus towards his residence, 31, Harley-street, Cavendish-square. He was at the time in his 71st year.

LORD LOUGHBOROUGH.

JAMES ALEXANDER GEORGE, Lord Loughborough, was the eldest son of James Alexander, present Earl of Rosslyn, by his wife Frances, daughter of the late Lieutenant-General Wemyss, of Wemyss. He was born 13th May, 1811, and, after serving as an officer of the 2d Life Guards, died of fever on the 28th ult., on board the schooner Mary Elizabeth, whilst that vessel was entering the port of New Orleans on its way from the Havannah. As his Lordship has never married, his younger brother, Robert Francis, becomes Lord Loughborough, and heir apparent to the Earldom.

BARON OSTEN.

THIS gentleman, a member of the family of Von der Osten, of high military and judicial fame in Hanover, earned his early laurels in the British service. He was first in King George III.'s German Legion, and afterwards in the 16th Lancers; he was in the Peninsular campaigns, and at the battle of Waterloo. He had a Waterloo medal, and also a silver medal of seven clasps, for having shared in seven victories in Spain. He retired from the British army in 1834. The gallant Baron, who was a general in the Hanoverian service, died suddenly on the 24th inst., whilst on a visit at Lord Scarborough's.

GEORGE WILBRAHAM, ESQ., OF DELAMERE HOUSE, COUNTY CHESTER.

THIS gentleman, the representative of the ancient and eminent Cheshire family of Wilbraham, died on the 24th inst., aged 72. His formerly sat in Parliament for Stockbridge, from 1826 to 1830, and subsequently became knight of the shire for the county of Chester. In politics his ties was with the Whigs.

His immediate ancestors, known as the Wilbrahams of Nantwich, sprang from Randulph, second son of Thomas de Wilbrugham, Lord of Radnor, by Margaret, his wife, daughter and heir of John Golborne, Lord of Woodley, in Cheshire; and were possessed of considerable estates in the Palatinate. At the Restoration, George Wilbraham, of Nantwich, was one of the intended Knights of the Royal Oak, his landed property being then valued at £1000 per annum, a very large sum for that period. The gentleman whose death we record was son and heir (by Maria his wife, daughter of William Harvey, Esq., of Chigwell, M.P. for Essex) of the late George Wilbraham, Esq., of Nantwich, High Sheriff of Cheshire in 1791, who removed his abode to Delamere House, an elegant stone mansion erected from the designs of Wyatt.

He married, 3d September, 1814, Lady Anne Fortescue, third daughter of Hugh Earl Fortescue, and leaves several sons, the eldest, George Fortescue Wilbraham, Esq., being now of Delamere House.

Edward Boodle-Wilbraham, Lord Skelmersdale, is the representative of a junior branch of the Nantwich family.

MR. GEORGE HERBERT RODWELL.

THIS amiable and clever composer and writer was member of a family long connected with the stage. He began his under favourable auspices, and at one time possessed considerable property. He was formerly part proprietor of the Adelphi Theatre, and for many years was musical director and composer of the entertainments. "Flora's Frolics" was produced at the Adelphi, and he also wrote the music of the "Pilot," the "Flying Dutchman," "Jack Sheppard," and many other popular pieces. His opera, the "Bottle Imp," had much success at the Lyceum and Covent-Garden Theatres. His opera of the "Lord of the Isles," brought out at the Surrey Theatre, contained some beautiful melody. Mr. Rodwell was an author as well as a composer. He wrote the farce of "Teddy the Tiler," for Power, in 1830, which had an extraordinary run. The "Chimneypiece," the "Pride of Birth," "the Sundeut of Lyons," "My Wife's Out," "Adèle," and other light afterpieces and some pantomimes were also his productions. He was subsequently professor of harmony and art Drury Lane Theatres. He wrote three novels, "London Bridge," "Memoirs of an Umbrella," and "Woman's Love." His last drama for the stage was the burlesque of "Asaël," at the Gymnase Theatre. Some of Mr. Rodwell's detached ballads will live; such as "O charming May," "Let the trust be dear woman." Mr Rodwell married the daughter of Liston, the celebrated comedian. This match proved very unfortunate. Other adversity, also undeserved, came upon him, which no doubt tended to shorten his life. He died on the 22d inst., at his residence in Upper Ebury-street, Pim ico. His demise is much regretted by the many friends whom his kind disposition, agreeable manners, and worth had obtained for him.

MR. WILLIAM CLEMENT.

[We have been favoured with the following memoir from an intimate friend of Mr. Clement, who, we regret to state, died suddenly, at Hackney, on Saturday last.]

Of a man so long connected with the London press as Mr. William Clement, more than a mere notice in our Obituary is due. But of a great portion of his life there is little known; and, even during the period of his greatest influence as an extensive proprietor of newspapers, he occupied so small a space in the public eye, that few beyond those who were connected with him in the way of business could be said to possess his acquaintance

His origin must have been humble. He seldom spoke of his outset in life, but it is believed he was born in the metropolis. When a young man, he must have been in Portugal, as he used sometimes to allude to his knowledge of Lisbon. Whether he followed any pursuit in the metropolis before becoming a newswriter, is not known. In that occupation his industry and attention were rewarded with deserved success; and when he resigned his business to Mr. Smith, he was one of the most extensive newspaper-dealers in London. His first became a newspaper proprietor through the purchase of a share of the Observer, then owned by a gentleman connected with the Post-office. The Observer was at that time a comparatively obscure paper; but Mr. Clement soon succeeded in obtaining for it a large circulation. He organised an extensive corps of reporters, who for the most part had engagements also on the daily newspapers, so that he was enabled to give full accounts of all proceedings of interest which occurred on the Saturday on the following morning, and thus to anticipate the morning papers (who alone at that time gave reports) by a day. He was at the same time exceedingly attentive to whatever occupied the public attention; and his liberal scale of remuneration obtained for him the ready assistance of several distinguished writers, and among others that of the Rev. George Croly.

When the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, during the Liverpool and Castlereagh Ministry, drove the late William Cobbett to the United States, Mr. Clement made liberal advances to him to enable him to defray the expenses of his own removal, and maintain his family in London. For some time Cobbett's "Register" was published by Mr. Clement, to whom copy was transmitted from America. Though Mr. Clement was rather reserved in speaking of transactions with individuals, he used to complain of the usage he experienced from Mr. Cobbett.

The success of Mr. Clement in conducting the Observer, and the capital which he had thereby acquired, inspired him with the ambition of being at the head of a morning newspaper. Before the death of Mr. James Perry, he was well known as the editor and proprietor of the Morning Chronicle, he had made several overtures for its purchase, which were declined by that gentleman. But the death of Mr. Perry, in the latter end of 1831, threw this paper into the market; and Mr. Clement soon afterwards acquired the property of it for the sum of £40,000, payable by instalments of £10,000. His capital was far from being equal to such an advance; and for the greater portion of the purchase-money he was obliged to raise funds by bills, which the credit of Sir John Key enabled him to negotiate. Through his bu. transactions, he became involved with Messrs. Hurst and Robinson, by whose bankruptcy in the monetary crisis of 1825 he was an extensive sufferer. In the meantime he had, in addition to the Morning Chronicle and Observer, acquired Bell's Life to London, which the talents and activity of Mr. Vincent Dowling made a first-rate sporting paper.

Mr. Clement, as may be supposed, had great trouble in fighting with the difficulties in which his bill transactions had involved him. The Morning Chronicle, more especially, suffered greatly from these difficulties. Mr. Perry had, during the two or three last years of his life, drawn a large income from it (upwards of £10,000 a year), by sacrificing its future prosperity. At that time the Times and Morning Herald were running a race of extraordinary expenditure; while the Chronicle declined making the most necessary advances. Whether Mr Clement, if he had not been financially crippled, could have succeeded in re-establishing the character of the Chronicle, may well be doubted. In liberality he was all that could possibly be wished for; but he had placed himself in a position for which he was peculiarly unfitted. He knew nothing of the habits and feelings of the West-end world, and could ill conceive what such a world required in a daily newspaper. The circulation of a morning newspaper was far more confined at that time to the metropolis that it is now, since railroads have opened the whole kingdom to them. As the conductor of a Sunday paper, Mr. Clement was without a rival when he purchased the Chronicle, but he failed to perceive that a very different system of management was required for a morning newspaper. The murder of Weare, for instance, was made the subject of interminable descriptions and large wood engravings in the Chronicle, which disgusted rather than gratified numbers of its readers, while to the multitude, who have only one day to devote to a paper, all the horrors of the tragedy in question could not be delineated too fully and too soon.

By the aid of a banking firm, Mr. Clement was enabled to struggle on with the Chronicle till 1834, when he sold it to Mr. (now Sir John) Easthope for about a quarter of the sum he had paid for it. He retained the property of the two Sunday papers, which he continued to conduct with success.

Mr. Clement was not only a liberal but a kind, warm-hearted man. His education had been, like his origin, humble. He was a good accountant, and could express himself clearly in a common business letter. In courage he was thoroughly an Englishman. His conduct in the famous case in which he was fined £2000 for libel, in publishing, before conclusion of the trial, a report of part of the proceedings after an interdict by the Court, furnishes a pregnant example of his spirit: he fought the case to the last, and thereby proved himself a true friend to the privileges of the press.

ELECTION INTELLIGENCE.

BRADFORD.—Colonel Thompson and Mr. Milligan addressed their constituency last Monday.

CARLOW.—Colonel Bruen is now convalescent, and hopes to be able to attend the meeting of Parliament on the 3rd proximo.

EAST KENT.—The intended retirement of Mr. Plumptre will occasion a vacancy in the eastern division of Kent. Sir Brook Bridges and Sir Edward Dering are in the field, both Conservatives.

EAST SOMERSET.—Mr. Pinney's seat, it is announced, will be contested

EXETER.—Sir Fitzroy Kelly issued his address to the electors last Monday, stating, that, having been invited by a large portion of the constituency, he had consented to offer himself as a candidate. He declares his sincere and unalterable attachment to the Church of England in all its purity and integrity; an attachment which he deems not incompatible with the universal religious liberty he would claim for that Church in itself indebted, as it has established, to the spirit of the agricultural, commercial, and shipping interests he declares his conviction that, under the circumstances which now press themselves upon public attention, the first duty to exercise the boundless duty of every legislator to lend its aid in Parliament to relieve the agricultural interest from the unduly oppressive burthens under which he says they have so long laboured.

GLASGOW.—At an dit on 'Change, that Hon. Baillie Secretary for Foreign Affairs has declined, in a letter to a registration agent in the city, to stand as a candidate for the representation of Glasgow, we believe, is incorrect. A communication has been received from the noble Viscount by a party in town, but it does not amount to a declinature; on the contrary, Lord Palmerston expresses himself flattered by a proposition to be elected for Glasgow.

GREENWICH.—Admiral Dundas has issued his address, announcing his appointment to the Mediterranean command, resigning his seat, and thanking the electors for having four times returned him as member. Admiral Honston Stewart and Mr. Montagne Chambers continue to be the only candidates.

HEREFORDSHIRE.—Mr. Wegg Prosser will not be again a candidate for the county. The Conservative party will support the Hon. C. S. Bateman Hanbury, a brother of Lord Bateman, who, we believe, is the first to take the path indeed his address to the electors. Mr. Cornewall Lewis has also sent a letter to his constituency.

LIVERPOOL.—The Liverpool Mail announces that the Constitutional Association has resolved to propose Sir Stratford Canning, who is shortly expected in England, at the next election, as member. Mr. Cardwell and Sir Thomas Birch, the sitting members, will be again in the field.

PONTEFRACT.—Mr. Overend Serjeant, the Assistant-Serjeant General Lord Frederick Fitzclarence will be a candidate, on the Liberal interest. If Sir Francis Baring be not in office at the next election, it is believed that he will not again offer himself

SHEFFIELD.—Mr. Roebuck, M.P., in his recent address to the electors, thus referred to universal suffrage:—"He did not think, whatever they might say, that the majority was always the wisest. He had rather a feeling to the contrary; and when he was in the majority he began to doubt if he was right. Hemight be wrong in that. Let them look back, and they would find that all the great truths that had affected the destinies of mankind had been at some period in the minority."

STIRLING.—The late Provost of the city of Glasgow, Sir James Anderson, will be proposed, at the next election, for his native place.

STOCKPORT.—The Manchester Guardian states that negotiations are in progress to return an influential manufacturer, a Conservative, in conjunction with Mr. Heald.

MUNIFICENT BEQUESTS.—By the will of Thomas Dickinson, Esq., late of Upper Holloway, the contingent reversionary interest of £12,000 (in addition to £1000 immediate) is bequeathed to the Governesses' Benevolent Institution on the death of his daughter, Mrs. Henry F. Richardson. Mr. Dickinson has also bequeathed (all free of legacy duty) £1503 to the Animals' Friend Society, £1000 to the London Hospital, £1000 to the Indigent Blind School, £1000 to the London Orphan Asylum, £1000 to the Infant Orphan Asylum, £1000 to the Marine Society, £1000 to the National Benevolent Institution, £1000 to the Destitute Sailors' Home, £1000 to the Deaf and Dumb Asylum, £1000 to the Royal Free Hospital, £2000 to the Holloway Dispensary, £500 to the Labourers' Friend Society; £4000 to Whitechapel parish, the interest to find twenty poor people with bread, potatoes, and coals who are constant attendants at Divine service; £4000, on similar conditions, to Holloway parish; £2000 to the Idiot Asylum, £1000 to the Fistula Society, £1000 to the Charing-cross Hospital. The legacies are of various amounts, not exceeding £20,000 to each relative, with various legacies of £10,000 and £5000 each to other branches, with £10,000 to his housekeeper. Mr. Dickinson was a merchant of eminence in Whitechapel, and a member of the court of the Drapers' Company, from whom he received a testimonial, which he has bequeathed to his daughter.

SPECIE FROM AUSTRALIA.—The vessel Anna Mary, arrived from Sydney, New South Wales, has brought 42 packages of specie. 3 boxes of dollars, and also 410 packages of copper ore; the Denselton, from Sydney, 424 packages of copper ore; and the vessel Ralph Thompson, from the same Australian port, 14 boxes of gold dust, consigned to eminent firms and to order.

KAFFIR QUEEN.—FROM AN ORIGINAL DRAWING.

KAFFIR QUEEN.

EVERY trait of the natives of Kaffraria is especially interesting at the present moment. This characteristic Portrait shows us one of the women of rank in Kaffraria, and affords a good specimen of the female costume. It is far from destitute of ornament: the lappets of the front of the dress, and the longest portion of the robe, being thick set with metal studs. The rings worn upon the wrists are also of metal. The upper portion of the head-dress and the band worn round the bust are white, with broad blue stripes. The necklace is of coral and dead-white beads; and the ear-drops are of the latter.

Mrs. Ward, in her entertaining "Five Years in Kaffirland," tells us that the Kaffir women carry their love of ornament to such an excess, that they have certain fancies relative to their beads, which have as much sway over the notions of the sable belles of Kaffirland as any fiat, or caprice, from the divan of a Parisian modiste, or the penetralia of a Mayfair beauty. One year the leathern bodice of a Tambookie bride is parsemented with beads of a dead white; another season the T'Slambie girls will quarrel for a monopoly of bright blue, and the Gaikas set up an opposition in necklaces of mock garnet and amber. Birmingham buttons ornament the skin cloaks of the women of Kaffraria, and brass bangles from our manufactories conceal the symmetry of their arms, which are models for sculpture.

INSURRECTION IN CHILI.

VALPARAISO has lately been the scene of a sanguinary struggle to overthrow the constituted authorities, the result of which has been a complete victory on the side of the Government. The focus of the conflict was Daguerréotyped by Senor Helsby, has been lithographed with considerable spirit, and has supplied us with the accompanying Illustration. It shows the contest between the Government troops and the insurgents on the evening of October 28 (6.20 p.m.). The details, from the Valparaiso Mercantile Reporter, are as follow:—

On the 28th of October, two days after the sailing of the steamer for Europe, Valparaiso was alarmed by the information that one of the military barracks had been attacked and taken by a band of men, consisting of about three hundred of the lowest rabble congregated on the hills, main top, and similar places. They took possession of 500 muskets and three cannon, marched down to the Plaza, and placed their guns in different directions. Our worthy Governor, General Blanco, immediately placed himself at the head of about 180 men of Regiment No. 3, stationed here, and marched to the Plaza to attack the mob, which he found without a leader. This small number, but brave troops, with their old General to lead them, surrounded the Plaza from the different streets leading out of it, whilst the mob were firing their cannons and muskets, attempting to force an entrance into the city, which they intended to rob and plunder. The soldiers, however, stood like a wall, and advanced in spite of great superiority in the number of the mob, and after a short fight the three cannons were in their possession, and the Plaza was cleared. The mob then ascended again to the q artel, and dispersed over the hills, firing down upon the Plaza and adjoining streets: the soldiers followed, and secured the barracks.

The greater part of the mob, intoxicated and without a leader, sought their safety in flight, and, though a great many chance shots were fired for an hour after, the battle was decided within half that period.

The fire of the mob was so badly directed, and so unaccustomed the greater part seemed to be in the use of firearms, that most of the balls either found their way into the balconies of the houses, or into the lower part of the legs of the soldiers.

It is difficult to state the number of killed and wounded on both sides; we are only able to ascertain it on the side of the soldiers, the mob having hidden their wounded, and buried their dead secretly. The Governor issued a decree demanding the delivery of muskets within twenty-four hours. The greater part were soon given up, and within a day or two peace and order were restored and maintained.

THE KAFFIR BUSH.

(Acacia horrida, Wildenow; Acacia capensis, Burstall.)

THIS specimen, lately presented to her Majesty the Queen and his Royal Highness Prince Albert at Osborne, was brought to England by S. W. Webb, Esq., surgeon of H. M. S. Retribution, from the Cape of Good Hope. This species is called by the Dutch boers the "Wait-a-bit," or "Kaffir Bush." It grows from six to twenty feet in height, chiefly near springs, ravines, &c.: it bears a small globular yellow flower. The frontier, at present the scene of the Kaffir warfare, is thickly covered for several miles with this bush, presenting an impenetrable barrier to regular troops, and an excellent cover to the Kaffirs, who creep along the ground underneath it, from which it is impossible to dislodge them. Several attempts to destroy the Bush by fire have been made, but without success, from its peculiarly succulent properties, and from its growing chiefly in moist places. It is also this natural means of defence which enables the Kaffirs to keep under cover so near Graham's Town with impunity.

GOLD IN AUSTRALIA.

We have been favoured by a Correspondent with a letter just received from Turon River, dated August 2?, the locality of the most recent discovery of gold in South Australia. The writer describes his visits to his sheep station at this place to have been unusually dull and lonely until within the preceding two months, in which the whole face of the country has become altered; "and in New South Wales, or, perhaps, in the world, there is not a busier spot than the banks of the Turon River, for a distance of from forty to fifty miles." He adds:—"My little farm here, which I purchased many years since, is situated about a mile and a half from the richest part of the river. I send you a Sketch, which will make the position clearer to you. By the time the reaches you the papers will, doubtless, have told you of the wonderful discovery of gold in this country. It was first found at a place about thirty-five miles west of Bathurst, and in less than a month there were no fewer than 3000 persons here. Scarcely had they been settled there a month when my overseer and another went to the river, and there set to work, at the spot marked H, where they found about an ounce of gold by washing in a tin dish. Upon receipt of this information I joined them, and remained there two days. In less than a fortnight the neighbourhood was crowded with drays and carts of every description. This was about the last week in June, and now there are at least 5000 persons on the river. The small dots are intended to represent tents, some formed of sheets of bark, and others of canvas, in which the men with their wives were rocking the cradles, and in some cases the whole family were at work. No profession, trade, or calling seems to keep persons from the diggings; and Sydney, as well as most other towns in the colony, is left almost entirely to the women. For a time it had the effect of raising provisions to a fearful price.

"You will take it for granted that I am hard at work at the diggings; but such is not the case. The land on which this discovery has been made had been my sheep run ever since I have been in the colony; all the sections adjoining my purchases I have rented from the Government from year to year. Now it will take up all my time and attention in looking after my sheep. I think I shall be better off for labour than many, and hope to be able to pick up some disappointed diggers; but how the large sheepholders at a distance will manage, remains to be seen.

"It must not be supposed that all who come to the diggings make fortunes certainly, many have done well; but hundreds are disappointed. It is a strange life, and a hard one. We have had a great deal of rain lately, which has made the work more miserable; although a gold-washer must not mind a little wet, as he has to rock the cradle, and at the same time threw water in, which keeps him continually wet in the feet. The soil is taken in buckets, bags, or any other convenient way, from the banks of the river; a bucketful at a time is put into the sieve, and the man, while rocking with his left hand, dips the water with his right, and continues pouring it into the sieve till the earth is clear, and then, casting a longing eye into the sieve to see if there be a 'nugget' too large to go through the holes, he unships the sieve, and throws out the stones. Another basketful is then taken up; and when from 50 to 60 sieveuls have been washed the rocker is cleared out, and what is deposited at the bottom is put into the washing-pan I have shown, when the gold, being heaviest, settles. Most of the gold found in the Turon is in small pieces; but there also are large ones. Since the hundredweight was discovered, about thirty-five miles hence, many seekers have gone there, and companies are forming to crush the quarts. I saw this gold weighed at our bank at Bathurst a most wonderful sight.

"I have been a purchaser of gold for a house in Sydney, at from £3 3s. to £3 4s. 6d. per ounce, on commission; I get 2½ per cent. for any quantity. The extent of my purchase to this time has been 517 ounces in about a month. I bought from three men who came from the Hunter, and had worked twelve clear days, 71¼ ounces, £233 13s. 5d. What will this discovery be thought of in England? We are all very anxious to hear. I look upon the transportation question as settled; the Home Government will never think of sending convicts to a gold country, unless they are mad."

The writer then describes the greatest art in the washing to be in cleansing what comes from the rocker into the pan; for the gold is not easily seen until it has been worked and shaken in the pan, taking care every time it is dipped into the water that it takes away some of the sand and the gravel without letting the fine gold escape with it.

(To the Editor of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.)

SIR,—I have long thought that the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS might become the means of directing the attention of gold-searchers to valuable gems often found with that metal, but possibly thrown aside owing to a non-acquaintance with their appearances in the natural state. I therefore send the following figures of the natural appearances of diamonds, corundum, spinel-ruby, garnet, topaz, tourmaline, beryl, and quarts.

The Diamond.—Figure 1 is an octohedron; Figure 2 an octohedron having six planes on the edges; Figure 3, dodecahedron with rhombic faces; Figures 4, 5, and 6 are rarer forms. Out of 1000 diamonds I have generally found about one of the form Fig. 6; about ten like Fig. 5; fifty like Fig. 4; and the remainder like 1, 2, 3, in about an equal proportion. With regard to the size and weight of diamonds, 500 out of 1000 which came in the same parcel were found smaller than Fig. 1, which is the exact size of a diamond weighing half a carat; 300 were of the size 3, 4, 5, and 6—none of these exceeded a carat in weight; eighty of the size 2 weighed a carat and a half; only one was as large as Fig 16—this weighed 24 carats. The remainder varied from 2 to 20 carats, a carat being equal to three grains and one-sixth troy. Fig. 7 consists of a conglomerated mass of quartz pebbles rounded through having been water-worn, two crystals of diamond (one the size of a small pea, the other not larger than the head of a small pin), and various grains of gold; the whole cemented together by oxide of iron. This specimen is peculiarly interesting at the present time, as showing the association of diamonds with gold; it was brought by the late Mr. Mawe from the bed of a river in Brazil, and there is a reduced figure of it given in his "Treatise on Gems and Precious Stones," plate 2; and it is thus described: "Cascalho: siliceous pebbles, aggregated and enveloping diamonds." He sold it to the late Duke of Buckingham, and it came into my possession as part of the extensive collection which I bought at the Stowe sale in 1848. Mr. Mawe states that when diamonds were discovered in the Brazils they were used as counters in playing cards, inhabitants being ignorant of their value until the arrival of an officer who had been in India, and who, being struck with their geometrical symmetry of form, took a quantity of them to Portugal, where their true nature became ascertained. It was recently been informed by two respectable persons from the Brazils, that in 1844 a slave was searching for gold in the bed of a river in the province of Bahia, and discovered diamonds. It being a new land for diamonds, 297,000 carats were collected in two years, which produced upwards of £300,000. I see no reason why diamonds should not be found in Australia, Canada, California, as well as in those other gold districts from which they have been obtained. The value of the most inferior diamonds, unfit for jewelery, is £50 per ounce. Could they be found in sufficient abundance to be sold at £5 per ounce, the benefit to the arts would be incalculable. Not only would the seal-engraver, waymaker, lapidary, glazier, &c., be able to procure them at easier prices, but numerous substances would be rendered useful which at present cannot be profitably worked owing to the high prices of diamonds.

Figures 5 to 11 represent four crystals of Corundum. This substance is commonly found in six-sided prismatic crystals, and frequently terminated at each end by six-sided pyramids. When transparent, and of a blue colour, it is known in jewellery as the sapphire; when merely of a red colour, it is called Oriental ruby; and when this colour is of a rich depth, the stone is more valuable than even the diamond.

Figures 12 to 14. Three crystals of Spinel-Ruby.—It is of various shades of red, and is easily distinguished from corundum by the peculiarity of its crystalline form and inferior hardness.

Figures 15 and 16. Crystals of Garnet.—These are chiefly found in the dodecahedron form; are occasionally of a beautiful red colour; when semi-transparent, are called by the jewellers "carbuncles." These are of comparatively little value.

Figures 17 and 18. Two rhombic prisms of Topaz.—It is found in rivers, frequently with all the edges and angles of the original crystal worn off, and presenting a round appearance, in which state it is often taken for the diamond, owing to the colour and specific gravity of each being the same. It may, however, easily be distinguished from it by the difference of the hardness and fracture, like Fig. 19. The diamond yields readily to mechanical division parallel to all the planes of the regular octohedron; the topaz only at right angles to the axis of the crystal, indicated in Fig. 19 by the darkest straight line, with a smooth brilliant surface, while the lapidary finds (from the shock of it may readily be separated parallel to the same dark line, each having the same brilliancy.

Fig. 20 Tourmaline.—A crystal having six sides, deeply striated in the longitudinal direction, and terminated by a three-sided pyramid; colour varying from black to brown and green. Transparent specimens are useful to the philosopher in experiments on polarised light.

Fig. 21. Crystal of transparent Quartz, or "Rock Crystal," frequently called a "diamond" in the mining districts, as "Bristol diamond," "Cornish diamond," &c. The crystal represented by this figure was brought from California by a person who refused £200 for it, under the impression that it was a real diamond, because it scratched glass and could not be scratched with a file. Its real value, however, is not more than 2s. 6d. The crystalline form would at once indicate the difference, and when broken the fracture would evince the curved fracture of broken glass.

No. 22, Beryl, presents an hexagonal prism, and is usually of a green colour. I have returned from giving any description of the chemical composition, relative hardness, specific gravity, and other characters of minerals, because I would not trespass upon your space, or give information which would be useful to the scientific reader only.

THE MANUFACTURE OF PRESERVED PROVISIONS.

THOSE who are conversant with the medical literature of the past century need not be told the ravages which scurvy formerly worked among sailors long confined on board ship. Peculiarity of diet was the sole cause of this, a too long restriction to salt beef and pork, and the total absence of all vegetable food. A great step was gained when sailors were supplied with lime-juice: attacks of scurvy then became less frequent; nay, if the lemon-juice were taken in sufficient quantity, sea-scurvy might be kept absolutely at bay.

Agreeable though lime or lemon juice may be, taken as landsmen take it, at no very frequent intervals, as a grateful adjunct to their drink, in habitual daily use becomes so unpleasant, that the most stringent discipline of a man-of-war has often been necessary to enforce its use amongst a crew: this lime-juice, so daily administered on shipboard, physically the best thing in the world, against which, although scurvy threatened with a penalty, the sailor often rebelled. It was not until M. Appert's discovery of preserving unsalted provisions, by soldering them into an air-tight canister, that we possessed the means of furnishing the sailor for months or years together with unsalted animal and vegetable food. This discovery was patented in England by M. Goldner, whose name has recently come very prominently before the public, in connection with certain stores of provisions intended for the use of the British navy, but condemned, after scrutiny, as being totally unfit for food. As the whole subject of these preserved provisions has naturally become a matter of public interest, and as the process itself is publicly attacked as being in wore bad in principle and deserving of reprehension, we have thought that our readers may be interested by a popular account of the mode of preserving the provisions, and a short exposition of the principles on which their preservation depends.

Most persons, however superficial their information may be, are aware that the exclusion of atmospheric air is an efficient means of retarding putrefaction. The housewife instinctively avails herself of this principle when she carefully potted ham or potted beef with a layer of mutton suet: it is done for the purpose of excluding the atmospheric air. But the housewife does not apply the principle quite far enough; she only compresses the meat, so that air can no longer touch her viands, it is true, and therefore their period of decomposition is delayed; but, were it not for the preservative agency of salt and other condiments, the air lingering between the finely triturated meats would have been quite sufficient to set up the most destructive putrefaction. Appealing still to domestic operations, we will now direct the reader's attention to the ordinary method of preserving gooseberries. Before they are put into a bottle with sugar and water, the bottle is placed in a saucepan of boiling water, and kept there until the gooseberries soften, and the surrounding fluid gives off steam, when a cork is lightly fitted in, and being secured with sealing-wax the air can no longer get in. Now, these domestic operations only effect a compromise after all: the atmospheric air is only partially excluded, and were it not for the assistance of salt and spices in the first domestic instance, and sugar in the second, the processes would not succeed.

That whilst the housewife accomplishes in part, Messrs. Appert and Goldner accomplish absolutely. They liquid every lingering trace of atmospheric air (or rather they can and ought to do so), and, then rapidly soldering the canister, the provisions will keep good as long as the surrounding tin plate.

Such is the theory of the process: let us now trace its progress, and, for the purpose of concentrating our ideas on a specific case, let us follow the various stages of preserving in a canister some one individual article of food: suppose we say turtle soup.

The various ingredients, then, which enter into this mystic compound—we do not pretend to be versed deeply enough in culinary science to know what they all are—being elaborately concocted according to the usual precepts of alimentary cookery, we put them in the canister in those quantities which the cares of the modern grocery trade in which three pounds of coffee are squeezed into the space of two, and the canister top is accurately soldered on. All access of the external atmospheric vapour we say we think we have cut off, but the existence of a minute hole penetrated through the canister top. This little aperture is all-important, as we shall soon perceive.

The case is now put to stand half way deep in a cast-iron trough containing a solution of chloride of calcium, through which passes an abundant ramification of pipes containing steam. The result is that the steam-pipes in question heat the chloride of calcium to a degree considerably above the boiling point of water; therefore the turtle soup is once more brought to a violent state of ebullition, and a fierce current of steam issues from the little aperture.

Now, the slightest consideration a moment will suffice to convince us of steam can o not issue without driving all the air before it; therefore, so far as our canister of soup is concerned, immediately the current of steam is seen to issue, we might touch the aperture with a drop of soft solder and hermetically seal the case at once.

Soups, indeed, are the very easiest of all provisions to preserve by the canister process, and it is only when we come to deal with the more solid articles of food that the manufacturer is required to be on the alert. Suppose, for instance, we had a fowl to deal with, instead of the turtle soup, then we must not forget that the bones of birds are liable to taint, and consequently the usual process of heat must be soldered down until the fowl has been maintained in a state of ebullition for such a time as in the operator's judgment may have sufficed to drive out every lingering atom of air from the interior of the animal. This is a precept of universal application, and from the neglect of which a decomposition of the viands would result. Finally, after soldering the steam-hole, the canister is not immediately removed from the source of heat, but its contents are raised, under pressure to a degree of temperature considerably above the boiling point. This part of the operation is essential to success, and by no means devoid of danger. We well remember hearing recited to us the relation of an operator who was killed most ridiculously and agonizingly by a boiled turkey. The canister in which the bird had been soldered was exposed to the process of heating under pressure, and steam was generated beyond the power of the canister to endure. As a natural consequence of this, the canister burst, the dead turkey sprung from his coffin of tin plate, and, killing the cook forthwith, made him at once a candidate for a leaden one, to illustrate in another way the effects of atmospheric exclusion.

There is a proverb of somewhat general acceptation, touching the purchase of a "pig in a poke." A bargain of this kind is usually considered to be inconsistent with that love of safety which characterises ordinary transactions of purchase and sale: yet there seems at first sight to be no alternative as regards the purchase of canister-preserved foods. People are usually content to open some four or five per cent. of a lot, and to assume that, as these are found, so will the rest be: for our own part, we shall not want any such proof as this; mere inspection of the outside of a canister would convey to us an absolute indication of its inside condition. Now, on account of the air soldered into hard coffins, their contents decompose, gas is generated, and the coffin sides bulge out. Well, the sides of a canister of preserved meat will bulge out too if any decomposition is going on within, and by this infallible sign may a good canister be known from a bad one. Of course, some little time after the preserving process has been concluded is necessary to develop this appearance, and hence it is far from a safe plan to purchase these preserved provisions immediately they have been prepared.

Supposing no such bulging out to be evident, but that, on the contrary, the sides of the canister are collapsed by the force of external atmospheric pressure, then may the case be pronounced good, then will its contents last, perhaps, as long as the tin plate itself. All that is now necessary is to protect the tin from rust, which is accomplished by coating it thickly with paint.

Now, as the Commissioners of Government stores referred to in the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS for January 17—boy were prepared in Moldavia, and hence the time occupied in their voyage here would have been quite sufficient to set up decomposition, and to have caused that bulging out of the canister sides of which we have spoken. We should like to be informed, then, whether this appearance were recognised by the Government inspectors? If it were not recognised—did not in point of fact exist—if the present condition of the food is attributable to a perforation of the tin from subsequent causes, that perforation must be visible. We desire to know, then, whether such perforations really exist?

As for the principle of the process, it is irreproachable, and cannot fail to be successful when applied with moderate care: we consider it one of the most valuable applications of chemistry to the necessities of man that modern scientific annals can boast of.

Our Sketch represents the establishment of Messrs. Ritchie and McCall, of Houndsditch, whose preserved provisions are excellent, as we can testify from experience, having examined the contents of canisters taken at random from their stores.

FIFTH DIVISION OF PROFITS

CLERICAL, MEDICAL, and GENERAL LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETY.

REPORT OF THE DIRECTORS

Read at an Extraordinary General Meeting, held at the Society's Office, on the 1st day of January, 1852

In accordance with the Provisions of the Deed of Settlement, the Directors have called the present meeting, for the purpose of laying before the Proprietors and the Public the result of the investigation of the affairs of the Society for the Five years ended on the 31st December, 1851.

On that day the number of Policies in force was twenty-seven hundred and fifty-six (2756), the annual income of which, after deducting all the reassurances, amounted to £36,000, to be augmented by the annual receipt of the Premiums on the New Assurances effected by the operation of the following Table:—

The Income of the Society, for the year ending June 30 1848, was £16,300; that for the year ending June 30, 1851, £36,100; being an increase since the last Quinquennial Division of £19,800 per annum.

In January, 1847 the surplus divided was £54,960.

The total Assurances in force at that date, exclusive of the Proprietors' paid-up Capital, of £50 0 0, were £661,227 11 1

The total Liabilities up to the same date were 583,114 4 1

Leaving a Surplus of £78,113 7 0

The above Surplus of £78,113 7s. 0d. is now to be dealt with, but in order to avoid investment fluctuation, the Directors have resolved to recommend to the meeting to divide the sum of £80,000.

In conformity with the provisions of the original Deed (which alone regulates the present Division) the Proprietors are entitled to the first charge upon the profits to the extent and to the amount ing the Assured for Life. This will apportion to the Proprietors £30 000 and to the Assured £50,000, leaving a balance of £48,113 7s. 0d. of the said Profits, amounting to £40,000, to be dealt by as a Reserve Fund The Proportion of Profits to the Bonus of 40 per Share and the Assured a sum of £131,125, being the equivalent in reversion to the above amount of £50,00.

The sum of £131,125 will be added to the policies, and be payable at the death of the respective parties, and will also now be dealt with, but in order to avoid investment fluctuation, the Directors have resolved to recommend to the meeting to divide the sum of £50,000.

In conformity with the provisions of the original Deed (which alone regulates the present Division) the Proprietors are entitled to the first charge upon the profits to the extent and to the amount ing the Assured for Life. It is also proposed that a like sum be added to the policies, and be payable at the death of the respective parties, and will also now be dealt with, but in order to avoid investment fluctuation, the Directors have resolved to recommend to the meeting to divide the sum of £50,000.

The consequence has been, that the Reserve Fund, which at the Division at the end of the first Years ended June 30 1848, was only £4,000.

Had increased in 1851 to £ 8,500
1846 to 16,500
1846 to 30,000
1846 to 40,000

And would in 1856 to £ 60,000

It is considered unnecessary to enter into any detailed statement of the [illegible] of the Assured, as the remaining two-sixths were thrown back into the general assets of the Society, and formed an ever accumulating Reserve Fund

THE LOCK-MANUFACTURERS of WOLVERHAMPTON (LIMITED CHUBB.—We, the undersigned, lock-manufacturers at Wolverhampton, who have been awarded Prize Medals at the Great Exhibition, in conjunction with Messrs. Chubb, have long with considerable surprise the pretensions put forth by them in their advertisements in the "Northampton Chronicle" of Oct. 27 and 28, that their locks are the best in the world, and we also before the public, and founding their claims to superiority on the ground of having special approbation awarded to their award. We hereby protest against such pretensions, and question their right to superiority either for principle or workmanship; we declare our belief that, as locksmiths, we are equal in every respect to Messrs Chubb, and we are authorised, on the authority of Dr Lyon Playfair, to state that the award of Special Approbation was intended to indicate that the collection, shown by the exhibitor generally merited approval, in addition to the specific objects by him noted in the medal award. It was also distinctly stated by his Royal Highness Prince Albert, in his speech at the close of the Fair, that the Jurors did not attempt to decide on degrees of merit, but they rewarded all who had attained a certain degree of excellence. Now we cannot, and we think the public will have the same difficulty in discovering the "decided meaning (so different from the conduct of Messrs Bramah, who also received Special Approbation with their Prize Medal) and we think that Messrs Chubb should have been the last persons to put themselves forward, after the great humiliation they must have experienced in having their locks picked by Mr Hobbs.

We hereby challenge Messrs Chubb to test their claims to superiority before a competent tribunal, at the time of arriving at the result, the judges to be chosen each alternately by ourselves and partly by Messrs Chubb, and the locks to be those shown by each of us at the opening of the Exhibition on the 1st of May last.

HENRY YATES. JOSEPH TAYLOR
BENJAMIN WALTERS CHARLES ALLEN
JAMES JESSON GEORGE HARLEY.

The above has twice appeared in the "Wolverhampton Chronicle," without being replied to by Messrs Chubb, we therefore leave it to the discerning public to draw the inference.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JANUARY 31, 1852.

NEVER had a man entrusted with high authority so noble a chance as that which was offered to the President of the French Republic on the first day of the present year. He had summarily destroyed a Constitution which had the fatal demerit of being unworkable; he had appealed to the people to ratify his violent act, and to grant him fresh powers for the government of the country; and the people had answered his appeal by a majority, possibly exaggerated, but most undoubtedly triumphant and decisive. Up to that period, though there was much to condemn in his conduct, there was also much to be said in extenuation, or, at all events, in explanation, of it. But his success, probably so much greater than he anticipated, appears to have turned his head; and every individual act, and the whole aggregate of his acts, between the first day of the year and the period at which we write, has not only been a mistake as regards his own position, but a crime against his country and against the public and private morality of all Europe. History offers no example of such prodigious and wanton tyranny as he has exhibited, of such gratuitous cruelty and wrong, or of such suicidal and parricidal outrage—suicidal as regards his own prospects, and parricidal as regards the interests and liberties of that generous and unfortunate nation to whom he owes everything. The wholesale deportations to Cayenne; the banishment of many of the most illustrious of living Frenchmen without trial, and without even the allegation of a crime or an offence; the utter annihilation of all freedom of speech, writing, and action; and the establishment of a grinding, unconscionable, and bloodthirsty despotism, successively astonished and alarmed Europe; and for all these acts he found, unfortunately, that the men by whose aid he effected his coup d'état were, if not ready and zealous, at all events obedient instruments. But there was a point to be reached in his career to which not even these men could consent to follow or to be dragged after him. M. de Morny, who served him so effectually in December, discovered his own conscience in January, and, much to his credit, refused to sign the decree for the confiscation of the property of the Orleans family. Even M. Dupin, whose politics were of the colour of the religion of the famous Vicar of Bray, and chiefly consisted in maintaining his own position at the Cour de Cassation, whatever might be the Government, and whomsoever might be the ruler of France, could not reconcile it to his honour, his dignity, or his self-respect to hold a judicial office under a tyrant who outraged justice and common honesty in so glaring a manner. In a remarkable and very well-timed letter, which the newspapers of Paris have not been permitted to publish, but which has been given to the world by the journals of London and Brussels, that eminent functionary has administered a rebuke which the French President, callous as he appears to be, must acutely feel, and for which it is probable that M. Dupin may, some fine morning, find himself an exile in Leicester-square, or, worse still, in the pestilential swamps of Cayenne. But such breathless races as Louis Napoleon is running are of necessity short ones. The moral sense of mankind can never be outraged with impunity. It was not so much the misgovernment of Louis Philippe, or the ungovernableness of the French people, that caused the revolution of February, 1848, as the public disgust at the meanness of his conduct towards the unhappy Queen of Spain. It was the "Spanish marriages" which rendered all hands powerless to preserve his throne, and which deprived him of the courage to strike a blow for the maintenance of his authority. The Orleans family would, in all human probability, have still been on the throne of France, if it had not been for the disgraceful intrigues which transformed the Duc de Montpensier into a Spanish prince, and gave his children a claim to the crown of Spain. Louis Napoleon, in confiscating or endeavouring to confiscate the property of the Orleans family, has committed an act still meaner than that was, and sooner or later he will meet his reward for it. There is a moral grandeur in public opinion, and in the public sentiment of what is right and generous, which no man, however exalted, and however powerful, can brave with impunity. Louis Napoleon is, even now, almost isolated; he has no friends except among the needy, the desperate, and the profligate; and what their friendship is worth—if it be not a desecration of the name to apply it to the feelings of such people—the records of all history experience abundantly prove. At the first symptom of a change for the worse in his fortunes, the whole crew will desert him, and those who now eat the crumbs from his table will, we may be sure, be the first under such circumstances to consign him to the swamps where he has sent so many of his countrymen, or to expedite a sharper and more fatal catastrophe. That a man who for upwards of three years played so prudent a part, and who in difficulty and adversity appeared to show heart as well as head, should in the days of his prosperity exhibit so lamentable a want of both, is the most extraordinary incident of our times. The old and trite proverb, "Quem Deus vult perdere, prius dementat," has received a new exemplification; and all Europe repeats it at each new freak of tyranny on the part of the President, and expects at no distant day the inevitable consummation.

COURT AND HAUT TON.

THE COURT AT WINDSOR CASTLE.

The Queen and the Prince Consort continue in the enjoyment of excellent health. The Royal hospitalities have undergone no diminution during the past week.

On Saturday the Baron and Baroness Brunnow and a numerous party of the nobility left the Castle. Major-General the Hon. George Cathcart, the newly-appointed military Governor of the Cape, arrived in the afternoon on a visit to her Majesty.

On Sunday her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, the Prince of Wales, the Princess Royal, the ladies and gentlemen of the Court, and the domestic household, attended divine service in the private chapel of the Castle.

On Monday the Queen and the Prince Consort took walking exercise in the Home Park and Slopes. His Royal Highness afterwards went to London, and presided at a meeting of the Surplus Committee of the Great Exhibition.

On Tuesday, at an early hour, his Serene Highness Prince Leopold of Saxe-Coburg, who had been on a visit to the Queen and Prince during the previous fortnight, left the Castle, on his return to the Continent.

On Wednesday morning the Queen walked in the Home Park and Slopes. The Prince Consort enjoyed the sport of shooting during the morning; and in the afternoon the Earl of Aberdeen and the Earl of Carlisle were added to the circle of Royal guests.

Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent has been a daily visitor at the Castle.

It is expected the Court will arrive in town for the opening of Parliament on Monday next.

The Marquis of Lansdowne (Lord President) will give a full-dress dinner to a party of Peers on Monday, the 2d of February, at his residence, Lansdowne House, Berkeley-square.

The Countess Grey has issued cards for an assembly on Monday next, at the noble Earl's mansion on Carlton House-terrace.

The Countess of Ellesmere has issued cards for soirées every Thursday during Lent, at the family mansion in Belgrave-square.

Lady John Russell received a select circle of the aristocracy and corps diplomatique on Wednesday evening, at the residence of the Premier in Chesham-place.

The Lord Chief Justice entertained a select party of friends at dinner, on Saturday evening, at Strathedon House; after which Lady Campbell received a small party of friends.

M. Thiers has left town on a visit to Lord and Lady Ashburton, at the Grange.

ENGLISH EMBASSY AT PARIS.—LORD NORMANBY.—It is announced that the Marquis of Normanby has, since his return to this country, resigned his appointment as Brit...Ambassador at Paris; and that Lord Cowley, Minister at Frankfort, will succeed to the post which is become vacant by the resignation of the Marquis of Normanby.

MARRIAGE IN HIGH LIFE.—On Tuesday the marriage of the Hon. Richard Cornwallis Neville, eldest son of Lord Braybrooke, and the Lady Charlotte Graham Toler, sixth daughter of the late Earl of Norbury and the Countess Dowager of Norbury, was solemnised at St. Peter's Church, Eaton-square, in the presence of a large circle of the friends of both families.

THE OPENING OF PARLIAMENT.

Preparations on a very extensive scale have been made on the works of the new Houses of Parliament for the approaching ceremony, which will be opened by her Majesty in person next Tuesday. The old House of Commons and adjacent buildings in Abingdon-street, and the temporary wooden erections and hoarding in Palace-yard, facing the entrance to Westminster Hall, have been pulled down, and the whole space thrown open, affording an uninterrupted view of the end wings of the new palace. The entrance to the House of Commons will be through Westminster Hall, a noble flight of steps at the western end leading to the main corridor or avenue of the chambers. The hall will be lighted by several gas illuminations of a spiral circular form, which will have a most charming effect upon the fine and stately proportions of the structure. The entrance of the Victoria Tower will be used for the first time by her Majesty on the opening. The state carriage will proceed under the tower, and her Majesty alighting will be conducted along the Royal corridor to the House of Lords. The entire line of quay, or promenade, fronting the Thames, has been lighted by some 40 or 50 gas-lamps, and from the water has a very pleasing effect.

The Earl of Derby will entertain at dinner a number of the Peers of the Country party on Monday next; and on the ensuing Wednesday and Saturday the noble Earl will give dinner parties to the members of the Lower House who at present sit at the Opposition side of the Commons.

MEETING OF THE PROTECTIONISTS.—Several of the leaders of the Country party were entertained at Burghley House, Stamford, during the past week, by the Marquis of Exeter, previous to the commencement of the Parliamentary session. Amongst those present were the Earl of Derby, the Duke of Montrose, the Earl of Malmesbury, the Marquis of Salisbury, Lord Burghley, Mr. Disraeli, Mr. Herries, Major Beresford, Mr. Newdegate, Captain Vyse, and Sir Charles Knightley. The Countess of Derby and Lady Burghley were amongst the visitors at Burghley. The party assembled on Thursday, and separated on Monday.—Morning Herald.

MINISTERIAL DINNERS.—The usual official dinners will take place on Monday, at which the Royal Speech will be read.

Mr. Raikes Currie has paired off with Mr. Bagge for the early part of the session.

PRESENT ASPECT OF PARLIAMENT.—DOD'S PARLIAMENTARY COMPANION.—The varied changes which the personnel of both Houses of Parliament present from year to year render necessary almost every session a new edition of this valuable little work, which has now maintained its position, as the sole standard authority on the subject, for twenty years with the public. Amongst the more prominent of the new features comprised in the edition for 1852 are the following; viz.—Notices of twenty-nine members wholly new to Parliament, or not included in the previous edition, a corresponding number having retired from Parliament, or died: a minute revision of that part of the volume entitled "Constituency," which now exhibits the number of registered electors and £10 householders in the United Kingdom entitled to vote, according to the latest Parliamentary returns; the numerous promotions which have occurred both amongst Peers and Commoners, in consequence of the last brevet, duly registered; notices of four Irish bishops who come into the House of Lords this session, and who had no seat in that assembly last year; also of four Peers who have this year attained their majority: whilst the several changes, or new appointments, amounting to thirteen in number, which have taken place amongst the Ministers and officers of state, within the last twelve months, are chronicled; and the respective salaries of Ministers, officers of state, and ambassadors, have been inserted, in accordance with the regulations which have recently taken place. The political opinions and pledges of members also have, as usual, been carefully stated on every important question, and altogether Mr. Dod has imparted to his "Parliamentary Companion for 1852" an amount of valuable information which renders it indispensable to that large section of the community to whom an intimate knowledge of the personal and political constitution of both branches of the Legislature is either requisite or a matter of interest.

EFFECTS OF THE ENGINEERS' STRIKE.—The Patrie states that, in consequence of the dispute in England between the working engineers and their employers, important orders for machines have been received in France from various countries.

Lieutenant Pym arrived at Berlin on the 25th inst., his enterprise being for the present abandoned. He was to leave for London on the 26th inst.

It is also enacted, "That two members of the Law Society established in Birmingham, to be elected by the said society previously to the annual general meeting of the governors of the said college, shall be members of the council of the said college." Her Majesty has likewise been graciously pleased to nominate a committee of council of the theological department, with important privileges, and powers to act in such a manner as shall appear to them best calculated to promote the purposes intended by the said department.

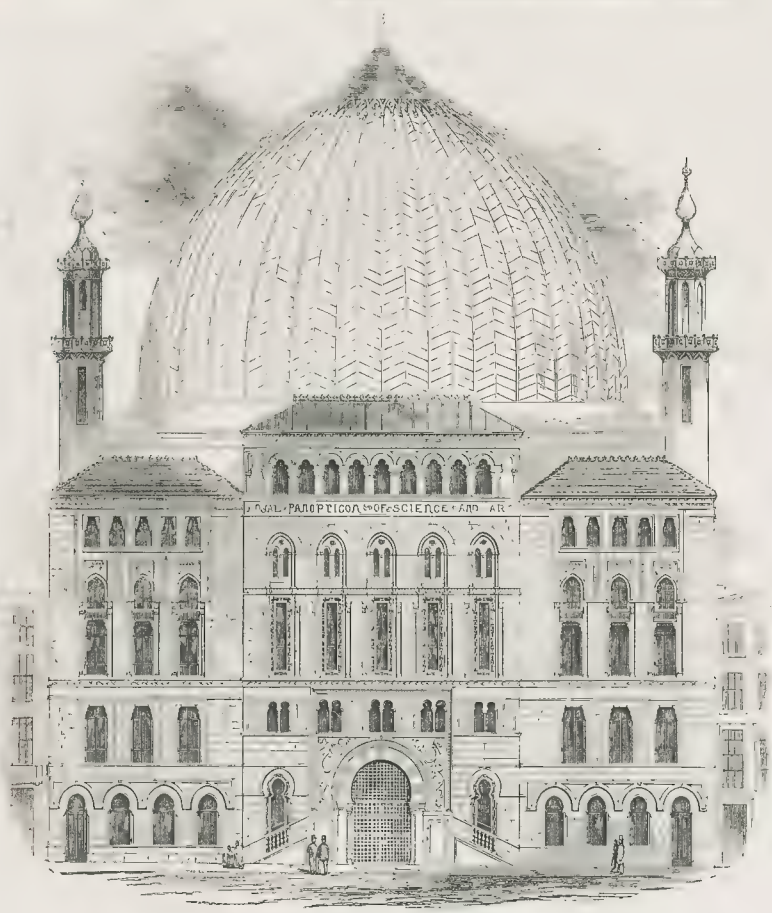
LAW INTELLIGENCE.

MILLER v. SALOMONS.—THE JEWS IN PARLIAMENT.—In the Court of Exchequer, last Monday, at the sittings in Banco, Mr. Serjeant Channell (with whom was Mr. Bramwell) appeared for the plaintiff to argue the special case as agreed upon at the trial before Mr. Baron Martin. The action was in form of debt for three penalties of £500 each, alleged to have been incurred by the defendant by reason of his having sat and voted three times as member for Greenwich, without having previously taken the oath of abjuration in the form prescribed by law. The special verdict found that the name of her present Majesty had been substituted in the form of the oath tendered to the defendant, by the authority of the House of Commons, in lieu of that of King William, and that the defendant had taken that oath, omitting the words "on the true faith of a Christian," after having taken the oath of allegiance and supremacy (omitting the Old Testament, as the form of oath binding on his conscience, and that he had then sat and voted. Mr. Serjeant Channel. submitted at great length, in a very able argument, that the defendant had not, under the above facts, taken the oath of abjuration as required by law, and that the plaintiff was, therefore, entitled to judgment. Sir F. Kelly (with whom were Mr. Willes and Mr. Goldsmid) argued the case for the defendant up to the rising of the court, and on Wednesday concluded his address, relying solely on the acts of Parliament, which he maintained ought to be construed so as to give the greatest possible amount of liberty of conscience to the subject. Mr. Serjeant Channel having replied, the Lord Chief Baron, after complimenting both the counsel on the able manner they had argued the case, intimated that the judgment of the court would be given speedy.

On Saturday last, in the Court of Queen's Bench, Dublin, Mr. Brewster, Q.C., was heard on the part of the defendant (Sir William Somerville) in showing cause against the conditional order for a new trial being made absolute in the case of Burch v. Sir William Somerville. Mr. Macgher, Q.C., on the part of the plaintiff (Mr. J. Birch, proprietor of the late Weekly newspaper), was heard in support of the order for a new trial, on the ground that his Excellency the Earl of Clarendon, who had been examined as a witness in the case, had not been sworn in the usual manner. The Court did not consider it necessary for the defendant's counsel to reply, and the Lord Chief Justice pronounced the unanimous judgment of the Court, that the rule should be allowed, and the application for a new trial refused, with costs.

PROPERTY OF LUNATICS.—The Commissioners of Lunacy, in their late report, gave great attention to the property of lunatics, which forms a subject of great and pressing importance. They point out the defective state of the law, stating "that to many persons who have appealed to us from time to time for advice and assistance towards the due protection and administration of the property and income of insane persons under certificates, we have only been able to express our regret that the provisions of the present law were inapplicable or inadequate to their professed objects, and to hold out a hope that a legislative remedy would be shortly provided." The commissioners refer to the costs and expenses of proceedings on commissions by inquisitions being heavy and disproportionate to the limited amount of the property or income to be administered. The commissioners add, that it is their anxious desire in every case as speedily as possible to restore to liberty and free agency the unfortunate persons for whose care and protection they were appointed. They earnestly pray that with respect to the property and income of lunatics will be forthwith amended.

ROBBERIES IN THE BRITISH MUSEUM.—A teacher of languages, named Charles Pickering, was charged at Bow-street Police-office on Monday, by Mr. Antonio Panizzi, keeper of the printed books in the Museum, with robbing the trustees of a number of plates cut from valuable works. The prisoner was a visitor of the reading-rooms since November, 1849, and had been introduced from a most respectable quarter. Mr. John Olivier, the publisher, had asked for Pickering's aid in a work on general costume from the 17th century to the end of the reign of George III., and the prisoner offered illustrations for a work called "La Francaise," affirming that he had cut them from an album. Mr. Olivier went to the Museum last Saturday, to consult Mr. Panizzi, when the latter immediately identified the prints as having been stolen from the Museum. On comparing the volumes of "La Francaise," nearly half of them corresponded with the missing illustrations. A search was made at the lodgings of the prisoner, and various plates from different works were found, which had been cut square and made much smaller than they originally were, with the exception of one, which tallied exactly with the part of the work from which a plate had been cut. The prisoner was remanded.



THE ROYAL PANOPTICON, LEICESTER-SQUARE.

THE ROYAL PANOPTICON OF SCIENCE AND ART, LEICESTER-SQUARE.

THE building now in course of erection on the eastern side of Leicester-square, by the Corporation of the Royal Panopticon of Science and Art, will, it is expected, present a finished specimen of the Saracenic style of architecture, a style which has as yet no perfect exemplification in the metropolis; and, while on the one hand the erection in question will attempt to convey to the spectator a model of Moorish grandeur, it will, at the same time, be no servile copy of any existing edifice. The splendid remains at Cairo have afforded much that is now reproduced; and it is from an actual Daguerréotype of one of the mosques that the model of the dome has been taken, whose intrinsic beauty in this instance affords an ample apology for the strict adhesion of the architect to the magnificent original. The imposing façade which this structure will present towards Leicester-square will be by no means diminished by the two lofty minarets which rise on either side to a height of upwards of 100 feet; and from which, we understand, it is proposed to exhibit powerful lights.

Passing through the vestibule or entrance, the spectator will be at once ushered into a grand circular hall of a diameter of ninety-seven feet, surrounded by three galleries, placed one above the other in the circumference of the building; and destined, as well as the centre, for the reception of works of art and industry, models of manufactures and scientific apparatus, and thus to afford the most agreeable opportunity to the sight-seer to mingle instruction with amusement. We must not forget, however, to mention that a very considerable space in the great circular hall will be allotted to an extremely large and powerful organ, to be built for the Corporation by Messrs. W. Hill and Co., whose success at Birmingham warrants every expectation which the most sanguine can form as to the compass and execution of the instrument entrusted to their construction.

The other portions of the building, though less striking, will nevertheless be first-rate of their kind: the lecture-rooms, laboratory, and offices will be of such dimensions and finish as will well warrant the beauty of the external edifice.

The original promoter of the institution is Mr. E. M. Clarke, who, having obtained the Royal charter under which the institution has been founded, has parted with the same to the gentlemen now forming the Council, at whose deliberations he, however, assists.

CRYPT OF ST STEPHEN'S, WESTMINSTER.

REMAINS OF AN ECCLESIASTIC DISCOVERED IN ST. STEPHEN'S CRYPT, WESTMINSTER.

On the afternoon of Saturday week, the body of an ecclesiastic, presumed to have been of some eminence from the position in which the corpse was found, was discovered by the workmen employed in removing part of the north wall of the crypt, necessary to the restoration of the edifice, which is intended to serve as a chapel to the House of Commons.

The body was found lying with the feet to the east, on the right hand of the altar—a situation appropriated only to a founder or other personage of superior dignity. The remains are those of a tall man, measuring full six feet. They are closely wrapped in linen, sewed longitudinally, and tied round by strings attached to the seams. The right arm was accidentally broken off a little below the shoulder when the discovery was made. The left leg still remains embedded in the rubble of the wall. On the right foot are the remains of a leather shoe. A pastoral staff, probably of cedar, lies diagonally from the left shoulder to the outer side of the right foot: the head of the staff is carved in an elegant foliage, and the stem cusped. The remarkable feature in this discovery consists in the circumstance of the body having been literally built into the masonry of the wall, without coffin or any enclosure, except the linen shroud in which it is wrapped; and by this it would appear to have been there deposited at the erection of the edifice; but whether translated to this situation or originally so buried, cannot be conjectured. The body lies a little obliquely to the line of the walk.

The accompanying View of the north angle of the east end of the Crypt shows the situation in which the body was found.

St. Stephen's Chapel was founded by King Stephen, in the seventh year of his reign, and dedicated to the martyr of that name. King John granted the custody of the Chapel to Baldwin, Clerk of his Exchequer. It was rebuilt by Edward III. in 1347, and a dean, twelve secular canons, thirteen vicars, four clerks, six choristers, a verger, and a keeper were appointed to serve in it. In modern times the Crypt was appropriated as a refectory, having been used for the Speaker's dinners. The ornamentation of this edifice is in the best style of the fourteenth century, and the bosses are remarkably large and fine, containing representations of the martyrdom of saints. They have originally been elaborately enriched with painting and gold.

A correspondent of the Globe suggests that the body is that of William Lyndwoode, Bishop of St. David's and Keeper of the Privy Seal, who founded a chantry in the chapel of St. Stephen by deed, and died in 1446, as on reference to the patent roll of 32 Henry 4, m. 4, there will be found an entry of a licence, dated 19th of July, from the King to "Robert Fyke, clerk, and Adrian Gruneburgh, executors of William Lyndwoode, lately Bishop of St. David's and Keeper of the Privy Seal, for the foundation of a perpetual chantry in the under chapel of St. Stephen, within the King's Palace of Westminster, for two perpetual chaplains, or at least for one perpetual chaplain, to celebrate Divine service daily in the aforesaid chapel, or one of them in the under chapel (St. Mary's), and the other at the chapel of St. Mary de la Perva, situated near the King's said chapel of St. Stephen, for the healthful estate of the King and his consort Margaret, Queen of England, and their souls when they shall die; and also for the soul of the aforesaid Bishop, whose body lies buried in the said under chapel," &c.

WATCH OF CHARLES I.

IN the Exhibition of Mediæval Art, held in the rooms of the Society of Arts, in 1850, was shown the interesting relic which forms the subject of our Engraving. It is the silver Clock Watch which had been constantly used by King Charles I., and given by him to Sir Thomas Herbert on the morning of his execution. It has descended as an heirloom to its present possessor, W. Townley Mitford, Esq., by whose kindness it was shown at the Society of Arts.

WATCH OF KING CHARLES I.

The face of the Watch is beautifully engraved, and the back and rim are elaborately engraved and pierced with foliage and scroll-work. From its undoubted authenticity, this is probably one of the most interesting relics of King Charles I. now remaining; and from its being one of his last gifts, it is the more historically interesting.

PARIS FASHIONS FOR FEBRUARY.

THE New Year has been commenced in Paris with a series of ceremonies which have been characterised by the most brilliant toilets The inauguration at Notre Dame, the ball at the Hôtel de Ville, and the representation at the Opera, presented rare displays; but the grand ball at the Tuileries outshone them all. The Notre Dame ceremony brought out the walking and morning dresses. The bonnets were of exquisite freshness, and were generally trimmed with feathers, flowers, and jet. We noticed that the richer Cashmere shawls had been somewhat laid aside, and that cloaks entirely of velvet predominated. Jet, lace, embroidery, brauds, &c. covered them almost all over. The long shawls are found to be rather heavy, and to crush the richly-trimmed toilet which is now in fashion: the fronts of the bodies, which are trimmed with lace, puffs of ribbon, and the slight quillings, cannot bear the weight of a shawl. The cloak, which is lighter, is accordingly preferred; and beneath it a guess may be made of the elegance of the waist. The materials for dresses are still the same; except that the antique watered silks, which were made plain or with large patterns, are to be seen at balls and parties striped and coloured, after the well-known Pompadour taste—a fashion till now applied to lighter fabrics. A few years back, jewellery was only worn on the head, and the parure of other days was composed of the necklace (the most important part), the comb, the earrings, and the diadem. This jewellery was afterwards laid aside, and bracelets alone were to be seen, several being worn at the same time. In the present day people have gone back to the Gothic and Renaissance; and in the invention of artistic jewellery it has been ascertained that the jewels which ornamented the portraits of the great ladies of other days, in the pictures by Rubens, Janet, and others, were quite equal in value to the comb set with diamonds of our time.

Jewellery is now more than ever worn, and is allowed even with the simplest indoor toilet; we have thus the chatelaine, which carries the watch, its key, and a thousand other fancies, called breloques. The waistcoats have introduced buttons; and there are the studs for the wristbands, cap pins, shawl pins, rings, and bracelets—all which reminds one of the past, and have brought back the lost fashion of coloured stones, as emeralds, rubies, &c. For evening, however, diamonds as head-dress are alone tolerated: the fancies for colours are restrained to bracelets and rings, to which have been added, for richness and brilliancy, the lustre and variegated hues of enamel.

The dresses worn are very pretty and graceful; they threatened last year a complete copy of Louis XV., without introducing the changes necessary for our time or our habits of life, not to speak of the actual good taste, which must be allowed to have made some progress in the past centuries, since we draw from them all they possess that is beautiful, rich, and graceful, to compose our toilets of the day. Gold is very much in fashion; the head-dresses are covered with it—gold sequins, gold blond, gold beads, and gold grapes.

GRAND STATE BALL AT THE TUILERIES.

ON Saturday night Louis Napoleon gave his first grand ball at the Palace of the Tuileries. The number of guests was exceedingly great. The first arrivals were as early as nine o'clock, and from that hour until nearly twelve the carriages were without intermission engaged in setting down guests. The President entered the rooms about half-past nine, accompanied by the new Ministers in their official costume, and accompanied by about forty or fifty personages of distinction, such as members of the Consultative Commission, generals, and others. He gave his arm to the Marchioness of Douglas, and appeared in excellent spirits. He was dressed in the uniform of a general of division of the French army, and wore the grand order of the Legion of Honour, with a magnificent crachat in diamonds. He walked four times through the rooms in the course of the evening, saluting with marked graciousness such of the guests as he happened to recognise.

The President did not dance. Prince Poniatowski, the Tuscan Minister, at the request of Louis Napoleon, opened the ball with a waltz, the Marchioness of Douglas being his partner. Princess Mathilde was present, and wore her magnificent diamonds, but it was observed that she conversed but little with the President. It was remarked also that the President conversed for a length of time with his uncle, the ex-King Jerome, who has been for some time on bad terms with his daughter, the Princess.

It was remarked that the principal men of the former Chambers were absent. No Legitimist was present, nor, in general, were the ladies of the French aristocratic circles. On the other hand, foreign ladies of rank were in great numbers, and particularly those from Russia. The Princess Worontsoff, the Countess Narischkin, and several pretty Polish ladies were frequently spoken to during the evening by the President.

The number of military men present was very great. There were, however, several Prussian and Swedish uniforms, and a considerable sprinkling of English ones.

Though the rooms were splendidly lit up, and the disp'ay of diamonds magnificent, the crush was so great as to spoil the general effect, and to make even the ladies' toilettes. Substantial refreshments of pâtés de foie gras, hams, fowls, &c. were provided in the long gallery, facing the gardens. A railing ran down the whole centre of the apartment, so as to divide it; and along each side buffets were arranged. But the regulation was that all the ladies were to pass down before one line of tables, and all the gentlemen down the other; there by preventing the possibility of all those pleasing attentions which ladies have a right to expect from the other sex.

Our Artist has engraved the reception in the Salle des Marechaux: the walls contain in compartments portraits of the marshals of France; and busts of distinguished generals and naval commanders are placed round the room.

THE THEATRES.

DRURY-LANE.

The lease has commenced his operatic campaign brilliantly. On the 23d inst. one of the three grand musical operas of Meyerbeer, and, in the opinion of many judges, his finest production, the mystic "Robert le Diable," was performed with signal success; and on the 24th "Fra Diavolo," one of the earliest and most delightful comic operas of Auber, was executed with an excellent ensemble. In these two works the talents of two different companies of singers were put in requisition, and the capabilities of orchestra and chorus were fully tested. Four débûts in one evening, and not one failure, must be assuredly cited as a remarkable fact in lyric history.

In the admirable interpretation of "Robert le Diable," and in its enthusiastic reception by an English audience, the true lover of art progress must sincerely rejoice. It shows how much has been gained in executive skill in this country, and it proves that the faculty of just appreciation has also increased immense way. On no former occasion has "Robert le Diable" gone off," according to the conventional phrase of theatres, with such animation and evident enjoyment of its superlative beauties. And yet the result did not so much arise from the genius of any of the principals as from the general closeness and completeness of the rendering. Schira directed the performance with the greatest tact—he had made himself master of the points of the elaborate but marvellous score, and he inspired his forces with the spirit and precision to do justice to the composer's conceptions. Where the whole was so efficient, a given, it would be indeed hypercritical to point out the few deficiencies in this remarkable execution. There are some drawbacks in the band, such as the obbligati, violoncello, of the violin, flute, oboe, clarionet, violoncello, bassoon, &c., came out forcibly and truthfully: a little additional strength in the violas and contrabassi, and criticism would be dumb.

As regards the new vocalists, that which we have long predicted, as to the self-creative character of a national opera, came to pass, curiously enough, on the first night, for a new English prima donna. Miss Catherine Hayes, on the morning after her first appearance she awakes and finds herself famous. Without a single dramatic requisite for the lyric stage, she achieved one of the most brilliant triumphs on record, such was the irresistible sympathy of one of the most magnificent voices ever organised. Scarcely able to move an arm or limb from fright and inexperience, provoking an involuntary smile by her most awkward action and bashful cast eye, yet did the house rise en masse and cheer her, as the rising star of the operatic horizon. Much has she to learn and acquire, but nature has given her such a lovely organ, that study and practice will soon set her at ease, and she has already won the public over kind and indulgent for the stumbling novice. Her method and execution are of course unacceptionable, and her success was the event of the night. Mdlle. Evelina Garcia was the Alice. She was born in Spain, but is no relation to the Garcia was the Alice. She was born in Spain, but is no relation to the Malibran and Viardot Garcias. She has had considerable stage experience. is a clever and intelligent artiste, with a thin soprano, the upper notes of which tell in concerted pieces; but her intonation is defective, and the deficiency of middle notes is very compelling her to resort to tricks to abandon deficiency of middle notes is very compelling her to resort to tricks to abandon the text of Meyerbeer for divisions which are no improvement. M. Fédor is a Russian by birth, who has sung in Italy with success. It was a daring act to make his début in such an arduous part as that of Robert, and in a theatre in which we have witnessed the failures of Duprez, Mario, Fraschini, Gardoni, and a host of débûtants, at the Grand Opera in Paris, two of whom broke down in the cavern scene, after the duo, Les Chevaliers de ma patrie." M. Fédor prudently reserving his powers in the declamatory recitatives, reached the trio finale without a break of any kind, singing many portions of the part with much skill and effect, and commanding an encore in the cavatina. A gentleman. There is much charm in the quality of his voice, and he will be, no doubt, a valuable acquisition. Mr. Drayton is a native of Philadelphia, and was a pupil of the Parisian Conservatoire—an indication of which was manifested in his Bertram being based on the Lovaszony reading of that tremendous bass part. Although he was suffering from severe indisposition, which caused, indeed, the repetition of the opera to be postponed from Monday last to last night, the out.urn of the baritone was sufficiently dramatic and impressive, and he will, doubtlessly, fill it anon in more elaborate details on a future occasion. He has a powerful voice, out in more elaborate details on a future occasion. He has a powerful voice, out in the upper range of which is the best in quality, and his displayed finesse in the use thereof in the subdued passages. The unaccompanied trio in the cavern scene was extremely well sung by Mdlle. Garcia, M. Fédor, and Mr. Drayton, and unanimously encored—the three voices being in good tune to the last.

The mise en scène, under Mr. Weste's judicious direction, was picturesque; the groupings were characteristic; and the orgies of the nuns, at the head of whom Miss Anne Payne gracefully distinguished herself, were well executed.

Auber's charming opera, "Fra Diavolo," was originally produced at the Opéra Comique in Paris, in 1830. On the 3d of November, 1831, it was adapted to the English stage by Mr. Rophino Lacy, and had a great run: Misses Romer and Cawse, Messrs. Braham, Chapman, Pearson, Wilson, Morley, G. Stansbury, and Keynolds, were in the original cast. "Fra Diavolo" is a very captivating production: it was composed the year after the distinguished composer had brought out "La Muette" ("Masaniello") at the Grand Opera, and had carefully examined both before he produced "Le Philtre" for the same establishment. From the well-known lively overture to the concluding grand scene of the bold brigand, the interest of the music is kept up under all conditions, and animated by a weight of admirable ensemble falling on the tenor part, Fra Diavolo, in whom, in fact, is centred the interest of the opera, both musical and dramatic, the characters of the two prime donne being but of very inferior importance. At Saturday's revival, for the first appearance this season of Mr. Sims Reeves, who made his début on the Drury Lane boards, after his return from Italy, in "Lucia" under Jullien's short career as a manager, Fra Diavolo was of course enacted so as to exhibit to the great English tenor the abilities they, however, so justly reliable. If not adapted for the highest-class parts of the lyric drama. Mr. Sims Reeves, in Fra Diavolo, achieved the greatest success he has yet accomplished, either on English or Italian boards. He is in every respect suitable to his powers. His rendering of the serenade, "Agnes," was perfectly beautiful, and elicited a most rapturous encore, and his delivery of the concluding scene was replete with vigour. He well earned the distinctive honour of being called before the curtain alone at the fall.

The prospects of a National Opera are now cheering. If our singers will but set aside their caprices and jealousies, put their shoulder to the wheel, or rather not refuse their "sweet voices" when wanted, and really look to the promotion of art. There is evidently a strong disposition on the part of the public to uphold an English opera-house, and it is to be hoped that there will be no occasion to enlighten the public as to the real reasons why there are such difficulties in providing amateurs with musical amusement and recreation

"Fra Diavolo" was to have been repeated on Thursday night, and the audience assembled in the theatre expected the curtain to draw up for the opening chorus, when Mr. Bunn came on the stage, accompanied by Mrs. Sims Reeves, and announced the indisposition of Mr. Sims Reeves to sing that evening. Mr. Bunn had certificates, and appealed to Mrs. Sims Reeves for its truth; but the cry of "No, no!" apparently in public opinion had been raised once too often, and the lesson had the greatest difficulty, with all his tact, to reconcile the audience to "Fra Diavolo," which was substituted, and in which the magnificent voice of Miss Crichton had the power of soothing the "savage breasts." Meyerbeer's work was given last night, and will be repeated to-night.

Miss Faucit made her first appearance for the season on Wednesday. The character selected for her present début was Juliet, Mr. Anderson enacting the Romeo of the evening. Never was Miss Faucit more firished and artistical in her delineation of the young and fair Italian. The softness, delicacy, and intensity of the passion were exemplified with the most exquisite art. The balcony scene was perfectly delicious; and in the scene with the nurse, consequent on Tybalt's death and Romeo's banishment, the agony and the despair were depicted with a blending of tenderness and power that reached the highest points of the histrionic art. In a word, Miss Faucit's acting was throughout charming—wonderfully elevated, but every where beautiful. That so captivating an actress had not succeeded in attracting a more numerous audience demonstrates with unquestionable force, that the attention to scenery, costumes, and other stage accessories, now considered as main objects in establishments, is as necessary at the national theatre as at the Princess', or Sadler's Wells.

HAYMARKET.

Mr. Howard Glover's two-act comic opera, "Aminta, the Coquette," the author of which is known to the public generally as concealed his name, produced on Monday night, will not immortalise his name as a composer Making due allowance for one of the most ill-conceited and dismal books that ever fell to the lot of a composer to set to music, the composition of that nondescript class which belongs to everybody and nobody. Mr. Howard Glover is a composer in search of a style: he borrows from every school, and his music is therefore neither one thing nor the other. If one listened to the unaccompanied quatuor in the first act, so well sung by Miss Louisa Pyne, Mrs. Caulfield, Mr. Weiss, and Mr. Harrison, there was not the slightest difficulty to trace the passage in the English ballad to the author of which the attention was for a moment fixed on the concerted piece in the last act, in which Mr. Harrison, as Fernandez, is condemned to death as a smuggler, because Miss Louisa Pyne, as Aminta, has persuaded him that she is the daughter of the Governor, and forces on Donizetti and Verdi was unmistakeable. When Mr. Howard Glover essays originality, his music is ugly, as the ungrateful passages written for Miss Louisa Pyne's wondrous voice sufficiently prove. Whether after the first night the audience were not, but a double encore attended the flimsiest and most commonplace air in the opera, "What a thing is love!" sung by Mrs. Caulfield. Of course, the life of the piece depends on the part of Aminta (Mrs. Weiss), who condemns him to death, is proved to be a receiver of contraband goods himself, and, to save his own life, he pardons Fernandez, who is united to the rescued coquette. The scenery and dresses had been carefully attended to; but we fear "Aminta" will be a waste of time and energy for all concerned therein.

OLYMPIC.

A new piece was produced on Saturday. It is called "A Conspirator in spite of Himself." A melodramatic, Impo Inkorn (Mr. Farren), ignorant of French, is employed to copy treasonable papers relative to the exiled Stuarts. One of the leaders of the Jacobite plot, Randolph Heartrope (Mr. W. Farren, Jun.), falls in love with Inkorn's stupid daughter, Bertha Dauvers (Miss Louisa Howard). Among the papers there happens to be one in English, disc ussing the full particulars, which Inkorn lays before the Government. The traitors are accordingly arrested, including Heartrope. The conflict of feelings here brings out the character of Inkorn, and certain touches of pathetic act ng on the part of Mr. Farren. Things, however, are not desperate, after all, for Inkorn recollects that he possesses in his own family the identical key to Bertha's father, promising to grant any request, in consideration of some important service. The requisite request is, of course, made and granted. Mr. Farren was efficiently supported by Miss Louisa Howard.

SURREY.

A new piece by Mr. T. J. Searle was produced on Monday. It is entitled "Annie Tyrrell; or, Attree Copse." The subject is somewhat out of date—poaching being the theme—but the author has made it interesting. Annie Tyrrell, through the instrumentality of the real reasons why there are such difficulties in providing amateurs with musical amusement and recreation

CROSBY HALL.

On Monday Mr. Love gave a polyphonic entertainment, which was witnessed by a crowded audience. Mr. Love has a talent for his delineations many characters, like pictures, and has also yielded to the spirit of the age in the getting-up of the pieces. He has availed himself to the full of accessories in costume and ventriloquism; and, in his selection of pieces, he exercised much judgment. His first sketch of his supposed grandson is an exceedingly humorous scene; while that with old Charley the watchman, in indicating vocal distances, is perfect in its illusion Charley the watchman, in indicating vocal distances, is perfect in its illusion Mr. Love is, beyond doubt, an artist, and his art, by long and constant practice, has ripened into excellence.

MARIONETTE THEATRE.

New pieces have been added to the performances here. The "Bottle Imp," with a piquant address, by Mr. Shirley Brooks, in particular, has been remarkably successful. "Bombastes Furioso" and "Faustus" continue to be attractive. The scenic accessories tend much to the popularity of the Marionettes.

WINDSOR THEATRICALS.

On Friday week Leigh Hunt's "Legend of Florence" was performed, the play of "King John" being deferred until next Friday. Mr. Phelps acted the character of Aquilante, and Mrs. Phelps that of the lady and wife. This character is believed, will take the part of Constance in Shakspeare's tragedy; the other two principal characters will be per-onated as we have already stated. We may add, that Mr. Wigan is engaged for Bombastes Furioso. In connection with these interesting items, we may mention, to the honour of the profession, as well as to that of the distinguished artistes themselves, that Mr. and Mrs. Charles Kean had on Saturday a private audience of her Majesty.

ST. JAMES'S THEATRE.—Mrs. Fanny Kemble will commence a series of readings of Shakspeare at this theatre on Tuesday next, with "Midsummer Night's Dream," accompanied by Mendelssohn's music, and an efficient orchestra and chorus.

WHITTINGTON CLUB.—MRS. T. C. Foster delivered on Monday her lecture on "Costume," accompanied with illustrations delineating female dress from the hoop to the Bloomer. Mrs. Foster is possessed of a very pleasing elocution, and, being also of an interesting person, the lecture was listened to with a sort of charmed attention. The subject was well treated, and as a composition her discourse had great literary merit. The room was numerously attended, and the applause well merited.

MUSIC.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

On Wednesday night Exeter-hall was crowded, to listen to Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," and his music to Racine's lyrical tragedy of "Athalie" Both works were executed, under Costa's able direction, most efficiently. The overture to the "Lobgesang," and that to "Athalie," with the war march of the Levites in the last-mentioned composition, were played to perfection by the band. At the introduction of the sax horn in Mr. Adams' overture had a magnificent effect, only to be compared with the wondrous use made of those instruments in the trio finale of Meyerbeer's "Huguenots," as it is done in Paris, where eight harps are employed. Mr. Vandenhoff recited the illustrative narrative with dignified feeling. The principal vocalists were Mrs. Endersohn, Miss M. Williams, and Mr. Lockey, in the "Lobgesang," with the addition of Miss Dolby in the "Athalie."

From the annual report for 1851, submitted to the general meeting last Tuesday, we learn that the receipts for the year amounted to £10 357 2s. 4d., of which no less than £3019 10s. 6d. were the proceeds of concerts. After paying all expe ses, the surplus, £1727 19s., has been invested in additional stock. For professional aid no less than £3309 had been expended last year. Considerable additions have been made to the musical library. At eighteen of the concerts during the time the Exhibition was open the number of persons present exceeded 2000 each time, and at seven of them above 2100 persons attended. We published the number of performances, and the works performed, at the close of last season, which was the most brilliant since the formation of this a laudable institution.

MUSICAL WINTER EVENINGS

Under the management of Mr. Ella, the director of the Musical Union, a series of the interesting entertainments was commenced on Thursday night, at Willis's Rooms. These entertainments are conducted on the same principle as the fashionable morning meetings of the Musical Union. The director strives to obtain the co-operation of the most eminent executive talent, and his first scheme was in every way calculated to inspire confidence in his tact and judgment, both as to the selection of compositions and their conscientious interpretation. The opening selection comprised Haydn's quartet in D minor, No. 78; Mendelssohn's posthumous quartet in E, Op. 81; Spohr's quartet in E, Op. 83; Beethoven's duet in E, Op. 5, for piano and vio oncel o; and Herr Pauer's capriccio, "La Chasse," Op 34. The executants were Messrs. Sainton (first violin), Hertz (second violin), Mr. Hill (viola), Signor Piatti (violoncello), and Herr Pauer (pianoforte) With such a galaxy of executive skill, and with the singing of Herr Reichart between the pieces, the "Evenings" have begun brilliantly.

MUSICAL EVENTS.

Mendelssohn's "Elijah" was performed last night, at Exeter Hall, by the London Sacred Harmonic Society, under Mr. Surman's direction. Miss Birch, Mr. Bodda, Miss Dolby, Miss Stewart, Messrs. Lockey, Cotterell, Frost Temple, and Phillips, were the vocalists: Mr. H. Blagrove, leader of the band; and Mr. Jolley, organist.

The English Glee and Madrigal Union gave their second concert, at Willis's Rooms, on Monday evening.

The fifth and last of the London Thursday Concerts took place on the 29th.

The musical entertainments for next week will be the English Glee and Madrigal Union, on Monday; Mr. W. S. Bennett's soirée on Tuesday, that of Mr. W. Binfield on the same evening; the performance of Mendelssohn's "Elijah," at Exeter Hall, under Costa's direction, by the Sacred Harmonic Society, on Friday; and English opera every night, either at Drury-lane or the Haymarket Theatre.

Mr. Aguilar's second soiree of classical pianoforte music was given on Tuesday, at the Queen Anne-street Rooms: he played the Sonata Pathetique, the sonata Op. 12, No. 2, and Op. 29. No. 1, Herr Jansa being the violinist in the former; and the andante in A and scherzo in C all works of Beethoven. Miss Messent was the vocalist.

THE PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.—The concerts of the 46th season are fixed for Mondays, March 15 and 29; April 19; May 3, 17, and 31; June 14 and 28. Mr. Costa is the conductor.

NEW PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.—The announcement of a new musical society under this title, whose performances will be given in Exeter-hall, has created a great sensation. The names of some eminent capitalists are mentioned as the associates of Mr. Beale, the conductor of the Royal Italian Opera, as the manager on their behalf The concerts will take place at Exeter-hall, commencing Wednesday, March 24, and to be continued fortnightly until the month of June. Mr. Benton, the celebrated composer, comes expressly from Paris to be the conductor of the instrumental and vocal complete orche-tra ever yet assembled for the execution of symphonies and overtures of all schools, and without distinction of country as to the composers. The production of new works, native and foreign, is the principal feature of the new society.

CONCERT FOR THE "AMAZON."—Madame Oury, the pianiste, is organising a concert on a large scale, to be given in the Town Hall, Brighton, for the benefit of the unfortunate sufferers by the wreck of the Amazon subscription. Mr. Balle will conduct a large band, with M. Oury as first violin; and Mr. and Mrs. Sims Reeves, Miss Louisa Pyne and Miss Fyne, Signor Piatti, and other eminent artistes have offered their gratuitous services.

THE ST. SALAMAN'S Amateur Choral Society, on Wednesday, Rossini's "Guillaume Tell" was executed

The second of the City Wednesday Concerts took place on Wednesday, when the vocalists included Miss Rebecca Isaacs and instrumentalists were Mrs Newton, Miss H. Cundell, Miss Magnit, Miss Messent, Messrs. Swift, Bodda, Sainton, G. Case, and Billet.

We are happy to learn that the concert for Mr. Blewitt's family will be attended with better results than had been anticipated, thanks to the exertions of the honorary treasurer and secretaries.

Mr. Smyth, the director of the Devon and Cornwall Philharmonic Society, is bandmaster of her Majesty's 19th Regiment, now quartered at Devonport.

The Birmingham Triennial Musical Festival, which, for more than half a century, has maintained a leading reputation in the musical world, takes place this year under the patronage of the Queen and Prince Albert, and under the presidency of the Right Honourable Lord Leigh; the days appointed for its celebration being the 7th, 8th, 9th, and 10th of September next. We hear that the musical arrangements are in a forward state; and we doubt not but that, under the skilful bâton of Mr. Costa, who, as on the last occasion, will preside as conductor, a great treat is in store for the lovers of that high class of music which can only be rendered in perfection at these festivals.

At the Classical Concerts, next Wednesday, at the Liverpool philharmonic Hall, under the direction of Mr. Thomas, the pianist will be Mr. Brinley Richards.

FOREIGN MUSICAL NEWS.

MUSIC IN PARIS.—The President of the Republic, on the proposition of M. de Morny, the late Minister of the Interior, has cleared off the liabilities of M. Roqueplan, the director of the Grand Opera, and prolonged his privilege for four years, thus enabling him to continue the undertaking up to the end of 1856. It is anticipated that the President will also aid the Théâtre des Italiens with an additional grant of money. The President will have a box in every theatre, and an extraordinary grant of 6000 francs is awarded for the benefit of those theatres which have no Government grants, to indemnify the directors for the losses experienced during the late days of December (the coup d'état). Rossini's new opera, "Robert Bruce," was revived last Monday with new dresses have been made for the ballet, which will be ready in a few days. At the Italian Opera House, Ferlotti, the new baritone, and Mdlle. Cruvelli delighted the audience with their performances of Rebecca and Abigaile. Susini, the basso, was effective in the high Priest. In "Fidelio" was in active rehearsal for Mdlle. Corbari, Calzolari, and Soldi. M Dejazet, son of the celebrated actress, has produced a one-act opera, the "Mariage à l'Air," at the Opéra National. The Legion of Honour has been bestowed on M. Francliomme, the famed violoncellist; and M. Perrin, the director of the Opéra Comique. The last letter of Rossini, dated the 16th inst., from Florence, is addressed to a lyric club in Marseilles, thanking the members for electing him honorary president, and styly alluding to the parts at the revolutionary changes, rejoicing that the sentiment for art has not been lost, and concluding by declaring that the composer of "old lumber" accepts with gratitude the honours conferred on him. Mdlle. Angri, the celebrated contralto, and Madame Frezzolini are in Paris.

THE GREAT EXHIBITION.—His Royal Highness Prince Albert presided on Tuesday afternoon at a meeting of the Surplus Committee of the Royal Commissioners for the Exhibition of the Works of Industry of all Nations in 1851. His Royal Highness, attended by Colonel Francis Hugh Seymour, arrived at the Palace at Westminster at three o'clock in the afternoon. The other members of the committee present were—The Right Hon. Thomas Labouchere, Sir William Cubitt, Sir Charles L. Eastlake, Sir Charles Lyell, and Mr Cobden, M.P. Mr. Edgar Bowring (secretary) attended. The meeting broke up at five o'clock, when Prince Albert, attended by his equerry in waiting, took his departure for Windsor Castle.

ARCHÆOLOGICAL RESEARCHES AT ROME.—A highly interesting archæological prize was brought to light recently in Rome, under the superintendence of the commissioners appointed to explore the neighbourhood of the catacombs beyond the Porta Latina, amongst a mass of old lead thrown up in other rubbish. In cleaning and examining the venerable metal, on being unfolded, it displayed parts of a tolerably legible inscription a sort of invocation to the god Pluto—and destined to act as a countercharm against the incantation of a sorceress, by whose arts a youth named Lentulus, or Lentilius, had been cast under a spell. Some victim had probably been immolated to propitiate the infernal divinity, and the request of the offerer deposited in the immediate vicinity of the altar. The orthography and style of the Latin, which is a metrical composition, authorise the supposition that it belongs to the republican period, and we have an example of the prevalent superstition which gave rise to it in Horace's seventeenth Epode, where the poet introduces a suppliant acknowledging the power of the sorceress Canidia, and entreating to be freed from her incantations:—

Jam jam efficaci do manus scientiæ
Supplex et ora regna per Proserpinæ, &c.

COUNTRY NEWS.

CONFLAGRATION AT MANCHESTER.

A most destructive fire took place in this city on Saturday evening last, which will have the effect of throwing a large body of operatives (about 300) out of employment for some time. The scene of the disaster was the large cotton-mill belonging to Messrs. Thomas Ogden and Sons, in Dickenson-street. The mill closed as is usual on Saturdays (three o'clock), and the workmen, having cleaned their frames, got away from the premises by four o'clock in the afternoon. There was, however, a shafting in the third story which had worked badly, and a mechanic employed at the mill was directed to remain after the other hands had left, to see that this portion of the machinery was got in proper working order for Monday. It was expected he would be able to do this before the day closed. The man appears to have worked till after five, when, no longer able to see, he went into the street and asked a watchman to go and hold his lamp for a few minutes to light him whilst he completed his last. The watchman did so, but, whilst he was assisting the mechanic to lift the shaft into its place, his lamp was struck out of his hand by the hammer of the mechanic accidentally coming in contact with it. The lamp fell amongst the cotton in the creel, between two self acting spinning-frames of 300 spindles each, and at once the cotton in the frames was ignited: the flames ran along rapidly from frame to frame, and in less than an hour the whole building, eight stories high, full of frames and spindles for spinning fine numbers of mule yarn, such as are chiefly used in the Nottingham lace trade. The men at once raised an alarm, and the fire-engines, being within half a mile from the mill, were lastly at hand. The watchman was but a few minutes to six o'clock, and about ten minutes after six, the whole town of Manchester was lighted up by the immense blaze, which had burst through the building in the brief interval. Although not less than five engines were on the spot speedily brought into operation, neither the masses of water poured forth from these, nor the copious deluge which was dropping from the clouds at the time, appeared to check the destructive element for a single moment. By half past six o'clock the entire mill was on fire, extending on yards in length by 20 in breadth, and the flames were streaming forth from 150 windows at each front of the lofty pile, till they met and formed an immense single sheet of fire over the roof. The building, though of fine construction for the period it was built, was 27 years old, had no fire-proof floors, but simply boarded ones, which would, of course, be saturated with oil and these materials burnt with a fury almost inconceivable. The sight of such a blazing mass when the fire was at its height was magnificent, and it lighted up the heavens for miles round. The destruction of the mill was accomplished very rapidly. Floor after floor gave way in quick succession, each falling through with its heavy masses of machinery; and the roof and large portions of the walls were also destroyed at the same time. In less than an hour at that was left was a few shattered walls enclosing a huge heap of broken, distorted, and black-coated ironwork, mingled with masses of bricks, charred wood, and smouldering cotton, the mere debris of an establishment which had been amongst the wonders of the age for the collection of mechanism and the results of ingenuity and skill brought together within its walls. The machines included the self actors, so wonderful in their productive power, and when at work apparently almost instinct with life and motion, and requiring but little superintendence from human agency compared with the great quantity of work they turn off. Mr. Frost, the managing partner of the millowners, was present at an early period of the fire, and directed steps to be taken for saving some cotton in an outhouse. The crowds of people who gathered round the premises gave willing aid at the engines, but the police were compelled to act with some vigour to keep back the masses so as to enable the firemen to operate with freedom.

The only portion of the mill saved was the engine-house, with a valuable new ninety-horse engine and boilers at the south end. The books were also saved. The property was insured in the Royal (Liverpool office), for £32310 ; in the Royal Exchange, for £5650 ; in the Phœnix, for £5650 ; and in the Liverpool and London, for £10,000 ; total, £54,260. The loss is estimated at from £45,000 to £50,000. The safe has been dug out, and the contents are not in the slightest degree injured.

EMIGRANTS' HOMES IN LIVERPOOL.—The Liverpool Dock Committee are at present deliberating what protection they can legitimately afford to emigrants in transitu, those poor people at present being greatly imposed upon by the lower class of lodging-house keepers. It has been recommended to the committee to erect an emigrants' home upon one of the dock quays, but this scheme is warmly opposed by a large number of owners of property at the north end of the town, who deem that the committee by taking such a course would interfere with the trade of the decent and well-conducted lodging-house keepers, who are chiefly tenants of such property, and with the operations also of other parties concerned in the emigration trade. A petition has been presented to the dock committee to this effect, signed by about 800 owners of property and ratepayers. The petition has been referred to a sub-committee of the general dock committee for consideration.

ST. ALBAN'S BRIBERY COMMISSION.—Monday was the day appointed by the commissioners for resuming the examination of witnesses at St. Alban's respecting the bribery and corruption practised in the borough, but no proceedings took place, an intimation having been forwarded to the bar by the commissioners that it is not their intention to resume the inquiry, it being now closed in so far as the examination is concerned.

FLOGGING YOUNG CULPRITS.—According to the Glasgow Herald, the Home Secretary and Lord Advocate have approved of certain regulations necessary to the working of the recent Prisons Amendment Act, by which magistrates will now be enabled to put the flogging as a punishment once more in force. A pair of tawse is to be provided to the satisfaction of the sheriff, and the punishment is not to exceed thirty-six lashes. The flogging is to take place in the prison in sight of the surgeon; and the age at which young culprits, and those only of the male sex, may be whipped is limited to fourteen.

FATAL COLLIERY EXPLOSION.—A colliery explosion occurred on Monday morning at Ringley, near Manchester, in the Cannel mine, belonging to Messrs. Andrew and Scott, which resulted in the immediate death of three colliers, and in 14 others being more or less burnt, of whom two are at the point of death, and three others in a dangerous state. The shaft is from 130 to 140 yards deep, the workings extend about 200 yards from the pit's shaft, which was generally very badly ventilated. On Monday morning the workmen, 30 to 40 in number, descended soon after six o'clock, and had scarcely got to their workings when the explosion occurred, a vivid flame rushing through all the workings from the direction of the shaft, accompanied with a rush of air and a noise like low thunder, which lasted several minutes. It knocked down many of the colliers, and threw about the tubs and waggons with such force that they were broken to pieces. It is believed that a collier named Henry Page had fired the gas. He had just been seen with a naked candle, going to an old working many eight or nine yards from the bottom of the shaft, and where there was likely to be a quantity of gas collected, to look for a piece of clay with which he might make a socket for his candle. After the explosion, all the colliers made directly for the shaft, some of them wrapping their flannel jackets round them for protection, and running on hands and feet to escape as much as possible the suffocating effects of the sulphur. Page was found within a few yards of the shaft, quite dead; and Thomas Lindley and George Grundy, two other men, were taken out quite dead. Page and Grundy have each left widows and five or six children.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

If the turf and steeple-chase fraternity are satisfied with one meeting next week, viz. the Lincoln spring, on Tuesday and Wednesday, coursers will have their hands full. Their sport is divided into seven meetings—the Shalfy, which Mr. Beaumaris), Eccleston (Cheshire), North Berwick, and Carlisle Park (each one day), and Spennymoor (two days). Wednesday: Red Deal (Cumberland), and Hartley (Northumberland), the latter two days. The entries for the first-named classes are on the qui vive for the acceptances for the great handicaps, which come at twelve o'clock on Monday night. They are expected to be fully up to the average.

TATTERSALL'S.

MONDAY. A liberal outlay on Hobbie Noble, Claverhouse, Orello, Ellus, and Homeowned, who were severally on the rise, was the characteristic of the betting last afternoon; in other respects business was dull and unimportant.

IRAUNDUS.—Too arbour under a great error. A collection of Chess Games cannot be got through the post with any thing like the celerity of ordinary letterpress. In any holding of the repeated revision of every page of the former by the author to ensure correctness, the fact of the greater part being in capital letters is an unavoidable source of delay. The capital letters in a printing-office bear but a small proportion to the others, so that a few extra sheets can be put in hand at a time, and these need be printed in the type, before any progress can be made with the next batch, and so on to the last.

ELECTRO-BIOLOGY.

(To the Editor of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.)

Last Wednesday, at the Music-hall, Store-street, Mr. Flake, in his introductory remarks on Electro-Biology, stated, on the authority of Sir David Brewster, that Sir Benjamin Brodie was a believer in that science. As I doubted that assertion, I wrote to Sir Benjamin Brodie, stating that his name and high reputation had been made use of in order to induce people to believe what they otherwise would not. As Mr. Flake would not allow the letters that had been received to be read without great opposition and wandering from the point, and as he endeavoured to cast a slur on the character of a gentleman whose only object was to elicit truth, I should be much obliged by your making public what Mr. Flake would rather keep concealed; namely, Sir Benjamin Brodie's letter. I remain, &c.,

57, Burton-crescent, January 28, 1852. SAMUEL COOPER.

The following is Sir B Brodie's letter: -

"Sir, Mr. Flake must have been misinformed. I am confident that Sir David Brewster never said that I was a believer in the so called science of Electro Biology. I can say nothing of what are called electro-biological experiments from my own observation, having never been present when exhibited. I have, however, received accounts of them from others; and it certainly seems to me, that the facts, as I have heard them stated, were all easily to be explained on well-known principles, by attributing them to the influence of the imagination in persons of weak intellect, and even sensitive nervous systems.

"I remain, Sir, yours, &c.,

"14, Saville-row, Jan. 22, 1852." "B. C. BRODIE.

EPITOME OF NEWS—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

The Duke and Duchess of Bordeaux arrived at Vienna on the 16th, from Frohsdorf, en route for Venice.

The masonic body of Cheshire have commissioned the rising sculptor, Mr. J. A. P. MacBride, of Liverpool, to execute in marble a life-size bust of their Grand Master, the venerated and gallant General Lord Viscount Combermere.

Captain Penny has again volunteered his energetic and indefatigable services in the new Arctic searching expedition; but the Admiralty do not seem inclined to avail themselves of the services or experience of any but officers belonging to the Royal navy. It is said Captain Penny will have an expedition fitted out for him by private subscription.

It appears from the report of the Commissioners in Lunacy that the total number of pauper lunatics in asylums, registered hospitals, and licensed houses on the 1st of January last was 12,059; 5492 male and 6567 female. From the annual report it appears that on the 1st of January, 1851, there were 16,486 insane persons confined in asylums, hospitals, and licensed houses in England and Wales, of which 7845 were male and 8641 female.

A Spanish journal gives the following singular names as those of two employés in the Finance department at Madrid:—Don Epifanio Mirurrazurrundiay Zangotita, and Don Juan Nepomuceno de Burrumuzquiricocheaga Zuzuarcoa.

The journal, in quoting the name of the latter of these hon. gentlemen, would have done well to have given some directions as to the pronunciation. It is Basque, and signifies "of the good head and very skinny river-side house."

The Commissioners in Lunacy, in their report just printed, call attention to the important fact that criminal lunatics are sent to ordinary asylums. There are strong objections against their confinement and association with the ordinary inmates. The Commissioners add, "The subject is well deserving the early attention of the Legislature, which has already made special provisions for the class of patients in Ireland."

On the 12th inst. the Roskild-Korsoer Railway Bill was carried in the Copenhagen Folk-thing by an immense majority. Thus is the Danish railway not commenced, and the country may look forward to a rapid development.

The non-liability to house tax of working-class model dwellings has been decided by the judges against the assessment made by the commissioners of the assessed taxes on the model houses built by the Sociely for improving the Condition of the Working-classes, in Streatham-street, Bloomsbury.

The differences between the London and North-Western and Great Western Railways, as to all points where they came into competition with each other, were amicably settled by Mr. Gladstone, last week, at Oxford, to whom the matters in dispute were referred.

Mr. Clark, engineer, of Pesth (whose name will ever be connected with the gigantic bridge across the Danube, uniting the two cities of Buda and Pesth), is in Vienna, occupied with a design for a bridge over the Wien river—all previous attempts, with one exception, having failed to resist the force of the current when that vile and pestiferous brook swells into wide dimensions and overflows its banks—an event of annual occurrence.

The intolerance of the Swedish Church laws, by which Lutheranism is pinned to the earth a helpless slave in the hands of civil power, while the laity sink into the serfs of the priesthood, has, during the last ten years, caused the emigration of thousands of the "pietist" peasantry of the northern provinces—a severe loss to a country like Sweden. This movement is extending to the south of Sweden, and a new emigration to America will commence next summer from Skane. Meanwhile the Swedish Church is being rapidly undermined by heathenism and democracy, King Oscar having taken no step hitherto for freedom of conscience.

The examine of the French senator, states a Paris paper, will be magnificently embroidered, at least if we may believe the designs which an artist has been ordered to draw. It is not yet known whether the coat will be in cloth or in velvet; but of it will be quite French, but more elegant than any that has yet been seen. In bringing embroidery into use for functionaries, it is wished to give a fresh impulse to that branch of industry, which has long been suffering severely both in Paris and at Nancy.

The plan proposed some time since by the Society of Arts for the establishment of elementary drawing schools for artisans is rapidly gaining ground in the manufacturing, and especially in the woollen, districts of the West Riding. Various meetings of the town councils have been held upon the subject, at which resolutions approving of the plan have been agreed to.

The sittings of the St. Alban's commission, by a strange blunder, were again fixed to the 25th of January, being a Sunday; a circumstance which, as it might possibly invalidate all subsequent proceedings, induced the commissioners, by their secretary, to address a letter to the Mayor of St. Alban's, stating that it was not their intention to resume the inquiry on the day fixed.

The King of Prussia having appointed the Rev. Mr. Valentiner as pastor of the germans residant in Jerusalem, it has been erroneously announced that he was the successor of Bishop Gobat in the bishopric at Jerusalem.

The Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty have given directions, as a precautionary measure against accidents from fire on board steam-vessels, that for the future wood used for the clothing of boilers are to be removed, and that the engineers are in future to make special reference in their final report—as to the clothing, and the security or otherwise from ignition.

The operation of adapting a new nasal organ to the human face, by covering the cartilages and forming a pair of nostrils with skin taken from the forehead and upper lip, was skilfully and successfully performed by Mr. Lukkson, at the Dublin Sturley College Hospital, last week. The patient was a labourer, of Barnet, aged 22.

On Saturday advices were received by the West India mail of the destruction by fire of the British ship Governor Fenner, from London, off San Francisco. The event occurred at sea, some distance from Lima, on the 8th of December last. She had several passengers on board, who, with the crew, saved themselves by taking to the boats, and were picked up and taken into Lima. The cause of the fire is not explained. The ship was but partially insured.

There is now living in the parish of Ilton, Ilminster, near Exeter, a woman aged 104, named Betty Caten, the ages of whose living progeny are 80, 78, 65, 63, 61, 54, 53—all alive! She has also 40 grandchildren and 200 great-grandchildren now living, and several descendants of the fifth generation! She is reported partly by parish pay, and partly by the benevolence of the ladies and gentlemen in the neighbourhood who know her extreme old age. She has always subsisted on the most simple diet.

Mr. White, an engineer, is on his way to Belgrade, to treat in the name of an English company with the Servian Government for the construction of a railroad from Alexinac (probably Alexinitza, near Nissa, on the Bulgarian frontier) to Semendria. It is expected that the Servian Government will continue the railroad from Semendria to Belgrade at its own expense.

As some workmen were felling timber near Herne Bay, they discovered in the centre of one of the trees a cavity, in which were the remains of a cat. The skeleton was entire, and some hair, of a sandy colour, yet remained on the skin. It is conjectured that the animal, having entered a hollow part of the tree, was unable to extricate itself, and the wood in process of time had grown round it. We understand that the skeleton of the cat will be sent to the Canterbury Museum.

PORTOBELLO.

THE UNION OF THE PACIFIC AND THE ATLANTIC.

FROM the beginning of history, and long, probably, before history was written, the attention of Europe was directed to the rich and golden East, the land whence spices, myrrh, and frankincense were brought to the earliest known progenitors of the European races. With even more than attention, with a fond lingering desire, did the early people of Europe turn towards the East and endeavour to get a share of its wealth and its learning, as if India were, as has been said, the original home of mankind, and that all the children of men were entitled to look on it as a common heritage. Certain it is, that at least as early, if not earlier than ancient Egypt, India was civilised; and its great wealth, the result of art and skill, made it an object of attraction to all who had strength to plunder it, or means to acquire by trade a portion of its treasure. Alexander the Great and Columbus were alike induced to undertake the enterprises that have rendered both immortal, by the splendour that from time immemorial enveloped in the mind of man the gorgeous East. From seeking a short and easy passage to India, Columbus became the discoverer of America; and though that wonderful event, and its consequences, made men forget for a time the desire that led to it, yet was a short cut to India, even after the voyage round the Cape of Good Hope was made, and all its treasures had become easily accessible to the Western World, never wholly lost sight of.

The broad expanse of the continent of North America, and the vast extent to which the other and projected into the southern hemisphere, barred an ocean path to India by the west; but the Pacific Ocean was scarcely reached by the earliest adventurers from Spain, and the narrowness of the neck of land that connects the two parts of the new continent ascertained, before the idea germinated of finding there a means of realising the long-cherished desire of reaching India by a short westerly route. Ever since the Darien expedition, in 1699 (wrote a correspondent of the Athenæum from Panama in May last), has the project of connecting the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans been urged on the world, and especially on England: even long before that, as early at least as 1551, when Gomara wrote, according to Mr. Squiers,* was this an object of speculation. The land was surveyed; but neither the speculations of the early adventurers in that part of America, nor the enterprise of even our own countrymen in 1695, nor any of the subsequent attempts, though the subject appears never to have been long allowed to sleep in oblivion, went beyond schemes and speculation. The time had not come till our own age—till the mines of California were discovered, and the population of Europe and of the western coast of America hastened to the eastern coast, impelled by the same desire as drove their ancestors three centuries before in crowds to America: till then the time had not come for realising an idea that has long haunted the mind of man, and for establishing, by continuing the perpetual progress to the West, a short road to the East. For upwards of three hundred years have some vague projects been entertained by Spaniards, English, French, or Americans of making a canal across the Isthmus, but it is only now, and only in consequence of many modern discoveries and improvements, that such a project has become at all feasible. The old notion has been, in fact, for some time vividly revived, and a short practicable communication between the two oceans, though not in the best manner, has been actually carried out.

Steam-vessels now go regularly both from the United States and from England to Chagres, at the mouth of a river of that name, not far from the old town of Portobello, on the Atlantic; thence passengers ascend the river in canoes for about twenty miles; and from that point, designated in our sections, they go to Panama, on the Pacific, by mules. At present the passage can be made in this manner from sea to sea in seventeen hours, but it more usually requires thirty. A railway, however, is constructing to connect the termination of the river navigation with Panama, which in a short time is expected to be completed. As an American has expressed it, you will then light a cigar on the Atlantic, and before you can smoke it out you will be on the Pacific. Steam-boats already ply regularly from Panama to Valparaiso on the south, and to California on the north. Between California and India a regular trade is established, and ships continually pass to and fro. It is not unlikely that before long screw steamers will be egaged in the trade, and will ply as regularly as the packets between Liverpool and New York. By means of these the inhabitants of the latter place expect to communicate with Calcutta in as short a time as we communicate with India by the Isthmus of Suez. We reach Calcutta in a month, but that is three times as long as will by and by be required when the railroad projected across Mesopotamia shall be carried into effect. Already many chinese flock to California, and are some of the best labourers of that new community, and already, therefore, is there a continuous and a short communication between the newest community of the Far West and the oldest community of the Far East. Two diverging families of mankind have now spread over the globe, and the newest civilisation of the West and the oldest civilisation of the East, after many ages, meet and mingle, coming from opposite directions, at the original point of departure. The desire so long cherished is realised, though in a manner different from the conceptions of Alexander and Columbus. The mysterious East is fully and freely opened to all the children of the West. Man's emotions or desires—instincts we may perhaps call them—are truer and more permanent than his ideas, and guide him in the end to achieve wonders of which his intellect forms no conception till they are about to be accomplished.

The union of the two oceans of the East and the West, the wish of so many generations, bringing ancient Japan into contiguity with the youngest of England's swarms—the humblest millions of the Old World with the energetic millions of the New—will give a fresh impulse to commerce, and will give it a new direction. There will be everywhere increasing wants to be supplied, and everywhere increasing means of supplying them. The contiguity will tend to unite into one all the different nations of the earth, and enrich all by the common exertions. The geographical position of the United States, the energy of their people, the vast extent and diversity of their territory, and the rapid manner in which they multiply, will ensure them a large share of the new development; but Mr. Squiers takes a narrow view of the great phenomena when he looks only at them as conducing to the political and commercial supremacy of the United States. In fact, a reference to the ordinary trade lists from the different ports of the Isthmus shows that all the nations of the earth, and particularly England, are sharing in the growing traffic across the Isthmus, as well as the States. Only the humblest red-tape philosophy, which has never got beyond the documents it has bound up, can suppose that commercial supremacy is due to policy, or that the possession of Gibraltar (as Mr. Squiers says) makes the cottons of England favourites with the people of Africa and Asia, from the Pillars of Hercules to the Persian Gulf. All commerce resolves itself into an exchange of equivalents, and a nation only obtains commercial supremacy by being in all respects a better customer. It must do more for others, or it must give them more than its competitors. But, discarding Mr. Squiers' politics, which rather deface than adorn his otherwise valuable work, we will cull from it some of the information it contains of the various routes by which it has been proposed to form either railroads or canals between the two oceans.

There is the route by Chagres and Panama, already referred to, and marked No. 2 in the Sketch which accompanies this article. The route at present in use by the river, and muddy ravines, and stony paths, runs through a country full of picturesque beauty not to be surpassed by the most celebrated mountain scenery in Europe. Latterly the frequent passage of gold dust in large quantities has gathered about it a rather questionable population; but, before that, the mixed races of Indians and negroes, and the descendants of Europeans, were harmless, if indolent, simple, but rude, and lived in the enjoyment of existence at a small expense of manual labour. Throughout the whole of Central America the plantain and maize supply the people, who have few wants, with the chief part of their food, and the plantain and maize are everywhere abundant. Beef, too, is plentiful, and costs about 1d. per pound. For half a crown a man may get a mule-load of plantains. Labour has been purchased for 8s. or 10s. a week. There is on the spot both food and labour; and nothing is required but skill to construct a perfect means of transit. Portobello (of which we give an Engraving), no longer so celebrated as formerly, is still a place of note, and is the nearest town to the starting-point from the Atlantic.

Panama (of which we also give a Sketch), at the other end, is situated on a rocky headland jutting out towards the islands which form there a beautiful and secure harbour. The town is picturesque: the houses are high-stone buildings; the streets are narrow. Like all the towns of Spanish America, it has a splendid cathedral. The bay is open to vessels at all times, and its trade is rapidly increasing. The completion of the railroad will give a fresh impetus to its progress, and it seems likely to become one of the most considerable towns on the coast of the Pacific. In it will centre all the intercourse between the islands of that ocean and most of the other ports on its borders with Europe and the United States, and it will become in time probably on that distant and quiet ocean what Liverpool or New York is on the Atlantic.

PROPOSED ROUTES ACROSS THE ISTHMUS OF PANAMA.

BAY AND HARBOUR OF PANAMA.

The cuttings across the Isthmus of Darien, which appear in our Sketch and section as No. 2, are not at present engaging much attention, on account of the difficulty of the country on the Pacific, all the increasing traffic now going by Chagres to Panama, or by San Juan and Lake Nicaragua. We may dismiss, too, with a single sentence the proposed railway across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, marked at the extreme north of our plan, which will, by and by, probably become a very important route, being the shortest between the northern parts of America, but with which no progress has yet been made.

The most interesting, perhaps, of all the schemes proposed is that of a ship canal, proceeding from Port San Juan de Nicaragua in a line with the river San Juan, or by that river to Lake Nicaragua, and from the lake by various routes to the Pacific. Mr. Squiers, who discusses and describes all these plans at considerable length, states very positively that the river San Juan cannot be made navigable, and therefore it is proposed to make a lateral canal. If he be correct—but, as his measurements are mostly guess-work, we do not place implicit reliance on his statements—this is a formidable obstacle, for the country adjoining the river is swampy, covered with forests, and very unhealthy. By no other route from the Atlantic than the river or a lateral canal can the lake apparently be reached, but from the lake to the Pacific several means of junction have been proposed.

Proceeding from the south, our Sketch No. 1 shows a line from the upper navigable part of the San Juan to the Gulf of Nicoya; but the intervening mountains make that route, it is supposed, wholly impracticable.

The lake itself is navigable: it is, in truth, a large inland sea. Next, then, it is proposed to cut a canal from the south-western part of the lake to the Bay of Salinas, the distance to the Pacific at this point being only 13½ miles; but here again the intervening mountains that run close to the Pacific (the lowest part of which is 258 feet above the sea) are considered by many to be an insurmountable obstacle. A canal in this direction has only lately been suggested.

A few leagues further to the north is the port of San Juan del Sur, and it has long ago been proposed to connect the lake with the Pacific at this point, distance 16 miles. Most of the surveys have been made with a view to this line; but between the lake and the ocean a high unbroken ridge of land intervenes, which precludes the idea at present of constructing a canal in that direction. A railway might answer, but that would not serve the object of sending loaded ships from one ocean to the other.

A further plan is to traverse the lake to its northern part, to pass from there by a short canal, which might be easily made, into Lake Managua, and from this latter to construct a canal to Tamarinda, on the Pacific, only 16 miles. The country is supposed to be practicable: the obstacle is the shallowness of the water of the Managua at the proposed point of exit. A canal must be cut in the lake. The harbour at Tamarinda is said by Mr. Squiers to be small, and not to afford a proper termination for a canal.

Further north, in the republic of Nicaragua, is the port of Realejo, No. 1B in our Sketch, which offers, according to the author, very great advantages. The harbour is good, the mountains interrupted, and the canal to Lake Managua, though forty-five miles long, supposed to be practicable. The intervening country is peopled, healthy, and well supplied with provisions, and can be cultivated to any extent.

There is still another project which has been suggested. Far north is the Gulf of Fonseca, into which flows the Rio Estero. This river is navigable for a considerable length, and a canal could be made from its navigable part to Lake Managua. Of all the projects mentioned, Mr. Squiers prefers this. He says:—"It may be safely asserted that a passage from the Lake of Managua to the sea is entirely feasible, and it only remains to determine which of the routes here indicated offers the greatest advantages. In case the canal is ever made, I am convinced this will be the route. My own observations, made from the volcano of Las Peiss, overlooking the Llano del Consejo, as well as the concurrent reports of the natives, has satisfied me that the plain is lower than that of Leon, and that the excavations on this line will be less than that of the Realejo." The following is a summary of the distances on these several routes from the port of San Juan to the Pacific:—

To	Length of San Juan River.	Distance on Lake Nicaragua.	From the Lake to the Pacific.	Between the Lake and Lake Managua.	Distance on Lake Managua.	From Managua to the Pacific.	Actual Canalization.	Total Length.
Bay of Salinas.....	70	80	13	..	..	..	83	133
San Juan del Sur..	70	60	16	..	..	..	76	146
Tamarinda	70	110	..	4	50	16	50	250
Realejo	70	110	..	4	50	45	199	479
Estero Real	70	110	..	4	50	20	194	354

Mr. Squiers observes that it is useless to enter into calculations as to the cost of the work, but, whenever the practicability is demonstrated, that must be the main consideration. It has (he says) been variously estimated, from 6,000,000 dols. (say £1,200,000) to 25,000,000 dols. (£5,000,000), but it may cost 100 000 000 dols., or £20,000,000. These calculations, however, are mere guesses. First the line must be selected, the country actually surveyed, the probable cost of labour in the district ascertained, and then an estimate may be formed of the expense. At present, with one railway sure to be constructed, and perhaps several: with ports both on the Pacific and the Atlantic, at which assorted goods could be better selected for either Europe or Asia than in London or Canton: it may be doubted whether a ship canal will be attempted, and still more whether it would pay. The great lake will prove a most useful auxiliary to transit, but connected with the two oceans by rail rather than by canals. Stretching far to the north, and affording a much shorter route from California to the States or the Atlantic than the route by Panama and Chagres, it is favourable to a quicker transit. With the imperfect conveyances now employed, the shortest journey yet made from California to New York, twenty-six days, of which we have intelligence only by the last mail, was performed by the port of Realejo, Lake Nicaragua, and the river, embarking at San Juan for New York. All the steamers on this line are now crowded, and one intended to ply between Ireland and New York has been diverted to San Juan, and, by the latest accounts, was about to start full of passengers proceeding to California by Lake Nicaragua. Tempted by gold which seems to have as much influence over the destinies of mankind, dispersing them over the earth, as the course of rivers, or the trade-winds, the crowded people of Europe are now hastening to the untenanted borders and islands of the Pacific, and are connecting the furthermost South with the extreme North, and the West with the East. Now only do men begin to know the globe, and now only can they say that they are spread, however sparsely in many places, over its whole surface

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

CABINET COUNCILS.—A Cabinet Council was held on Saturday at the Foreign Office, Downing-street. The Ministers present were, Lord John Russell, the Lord Chancellor, the Earl of Minto, Sir George Grey, Earl Granville, Earl Grey, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir Francis Baring, the Earl of Carlisle, the Right Hon. Henry Labouchere, the Right Hon Fox Maule, and Lord Seymour. The council sat two hours and a half. The absent Ministers were the Marquis of Clanricarde, the Marquis of Lansdowne, and Lord Broughton. On Tuesday afternoon another Cabinet Council was held, which was attended by all the Ministers, except Lord Brougham and the Earl of Minto. The council sat two hours and a half. A third Cabinet Council was held on Wednesday at the Foreign office, which sat for four hours and a half. Every member of the Ministry was present on the occasion

INTERNATIONAL POSTAGE.—The first deputation received by the new Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs was on the 23rd inst., from the association to obtain postal communication between all nations by means of the lowest practicable uniform charge for ship transit of letters and prepaid papers, so formed during the Great Exhibition. Sir J. Bolleau, Sir John Bowring, Mr. Moffatt, M.P., Mr. M Gibson, Mr. Cole, and Mr Duke having pointed out to Earl Granville the advantage and importance of securing the assent of foreign Governments to Jon in a Postal Congress; having shown that, as regards our colonies, the Ministry might induce the Colonial Secretary, Earl Grey, to take some steps; and having proved that, financially, there would be no loss in the extension of the penny postage system, Earl Granville replied, that, as vice-president of the Royal Commission of the Great Exhibition, he concurred in the views of the deputation, and that the present was a very happy time for the promotion of their objects. He had considered the results of the Exhibition most practical details which must be considered in other departments—in those of the Postmaster-General and of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He believed that both were considering the subject, and doing a great deal to remove the most glaring anomalies that at present existed in Post-office communication. It was a question whether the objects of an international postage should be negotiated at once with all other countries, or in detail with individual Governments. He would communicate to his colleagues what had been stated to him on that occasion, and do everything in his power to assist the views of the deputation. He concluded by expressing his sense of the attention and labour which were required as a substitute for the great ability and talent of the remarkable man whom he had succeeded in office.

SOCIETY OF ARTS.—On Wednesday evening the eighth of the series of lectures on subjects connected with the Great Exhibition was delivered in the Rev. Professor Willis, F.R.S., the matter treated being, "Machines and Tools for working in Metal, Wood, and other Materials." Mr. Isambert Brunel, C.E., was in the chair. The professor commenced by the exhibition of models of the machinery of manufactures of this and foreign countries: it was almost impossible to exhibit all the processes carried forward by mechanical contrivances—noise, dust, chips, an unequal temperature, and a variety of similar causes, interfering with a general exhibition of engineering processes. He urged the necessity of workmen making themselves acquainted with the mechanical operations of other avocations besides those in which they were engaged, and of a more intimate connection between scientific and working men. Referring to prodigies of art achieved by illiterate and uneducated persons with insufficient tools, and to specimens of good carving with a common penknife, he observed what a fool the man must have been to have done so when he might have used a better implement, the "chisel," the recognised instrument for such works of art. On the other hand, it was quite likely that the mechanician would be unacquainted with the practical operation of machines with the geometrical laws on which he (the mathematician) is so well acquainted. The lecturer showed how machines constructed for the most various purposes, such as the smoke-jack and the tide-bore, may combine some of the most complex and elementary principles which rule the most elaborate and complex pieces of mechanism. He dwelt on the importance of adaptation of parts to a specific purpose; an excellence which consisted in the absence of friction, or other cause, may prove a failure. The action of the planing-machine, the origin of the latter, the dividing-machine, the fusee-engine (the invention of which he ascribed to an Englishman, Mr. Jones, a watch-maker), the screw-cutting machine (invented by the chairman's father), came necessarily under notice, but, without the ingenious models, diagrams, and drawings of the learned professor, it is impossible to follow the development of the several arts. Lord Dr. Lyon Playfair seconded, a vote of thanks to the lecturer, who, in acknowledging the compliment, stated that his models for illustrating various mechanical actions were quite simple, portable, and inexpensive, so that they might be introduced into the humblest schools.

ROYAL INSTITUTION.—Professor Faraday on the 23d inst. delivered a lecture on a method of measuring the force of magnetic powers with the greatest precision and certainty. He showed, by experiments, the common phenomena of attraction and repulsion, as evinced by the action of a magnet on a horizontal needle, and cited the general law that the magnetic action is inversely as the square of the distance, which is only true in the case of a single pole, and not for very small ones. He explained the theory of lines of magnetic power. By passing a horizontal needle about a magnet from one pole to another, he showed that at every point it formed a tangent to the curve, which, under this arrangement, each small particle of iron formed itself a tangent. If iron filings or nails be strewed about a common rectilineal or cylindrical magnet, they will assume the form of curved lines admirably adapted to show the law of the variation of the greatest distance from it in the production of a line through the equatorial axis. If a metallic wire be laid along in the direction of these lines there will be no electrical action; but if it be laid across these curves, electrical currents will, obviously, a current of electricity will pass, which may be measured with the greatest accuracy by the galvanometer. In various interesting experiments the professor showed the exactness of measuring magnetic forces by the use of curves of variation of a parallelogram of metallic wire, he produced successive movements of the needle of the galvanometer; and, by moving it the contrary way, and cutting their parallel lines in the opposite direction, exhibited the movement of the wire the other way. He considered the earth as one great source of magnetism, and assumed that the magnetic lines of force enter her and make a complete circuit, the direction of them being shown by the vertical dip of the needle; and argued that, if this were the case, by intersecting these lines an electrical current ought to be formed, as he had already shown, with smaller magnets. This, in his concluding experiments, he most successfully demonstrated, as we have stated above.

GEOGRAPHICAL SOCIETY.—At Monday's meeting—Sir R. Murchison in the chair—Captain Sykes, R.E., read the second part of his paper on communication between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, and British North America, by taking advantage of the St. Lawrence and the great Canadian lakes. Westward of Lake Superior there exist numerous lakes and rivers, the waters of which, though separated, in some instances, by a few miles only, run to the Pacific by the Lake of the Woods and the rivers Assiniboya and Saskatchewan. Sir R. Murchison approved of the proposal, comparing it in importance to the connecting the Black Sea with the Baltic, observed by Peter the Great of Russia. Major Cauchlan and Smyth was in its favour, as he disliked the monopoly of the Hudson's Bay Company. Captain Synge, in answer to some objections from Mr. Crawford, especially that he wished to see an electro-telegraphic wire laid established, though his views were directed in the first place to water communication. Sir R. Murchison announced, before the society adjourned, that the subscriptions in aid of Captain Beaten's expedition in search of Sir John Franklin were proceeding favourably, and the Russian authorities had promised to render every facility and assistance.

INSTITUTION OF CIVIL ENGINEERS.—At Tuesday's meeting—Mr. J. M. Kendal, president, in the chair—the discussion was renewed "On the Advantages of Formations and the Local Changes of the South-Eastern Coast of England," by Mr. J. B. Redman, M. Inst. C. E., and many of the views stated by the author in the paper were still further argued. The paper "On the Construction of a Cast-iron Viaduct erected at Manchester, forming part of the Joint Station of the London and North-Western, and Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railways," by Mr. A. S. Jee, M. Inst. C. E. The object of this structure was to obtain increased accommodation for the goods station of the two companies, which was formed on brick arches, at a level of about 30 feet above the adjacent streets, the arches being unsuitable for warehouse purposes, and the communication between the two levels being effected by means of hoists. This extension was 700 feet long and 36 feet wide. Messrs Robinson and Russell were the contractors, and they had satisfactorily performed the work for the total cost of which, including 21 turn-tables, was under £14,000, or about £20 per lineal foot.

ELEMENTARY DRAWING AND MODEL SCHOOLS FOR ARTISANS.—A meeting of the committee—the Earl of Carlisle in the chair—was held on Wednesday, at the house of the Society of Arts, for the purpose of making arrangements for a deputation to visit Bradford and the West Riding generally, on Monday next. The committee stated, that, in order to provide a fund for establishing these schools on a permanent footing, it is desirable that the power of raising local rates at present enjoyed by museums and other institutions should be extended to schools of design.

LONDON ORPHAN ASYLUM.—On Monday the annual meeting took place at the London Tavern; Mr. James Capel in the chair. The report stated that at the present time, with the thirty elected on Monday, the entire number under the protection of the institution would be 64, making the total number who have received the benefit of the charity 1972. The legacies received were as follow:—£30 from Mrs. Susanna Shepherd, £100 from Mrs. Charlotte Rayner, and £200 from John Bellenden Ker, Esq. The examiners had borne testimony to the satisfactory state of the schools, and it appeared that many of the girls who had entered educational establishments had shown considerable talent. The number of children admitted every year amounted to sixty by election, and the entire number in the institution was nearly 400. The asylum was now becoming uncommonly full, and the only satisfactory mode of meeting the difficulty would be by an enlargement of the building. The annual subscriptions had increased to the amount of £400 over those of the preceding year. The accounts showed that the receipts were £9491 16s. 1d., and the expenditure £9311 17s. 7d., leaving a balance of £189 19s. 6d.

ROYAL DISPENSARY FOR DISEASES OF THE EAR, DEAN-STREET, SOHO-SQUARE.—The half-yearly meeting of this most useful institution was held on Wednesday; Mr. Richard John Cole in the chair. The secretary read the report and the amount of subscriptions received during the last six months, from which it appeared that the institution was in a most flourishing condition, the donations and subscriptions. The able report of Mr. Harvey, surgeon to the institution, showed that the numbers admitted of the various diseases of the ear, and some complicated affections of the head, during the last six months, amounted to 506; cured 196, remaining in weekly attendance upwards of 300. The well-known ability and success of Mr. Harvey in treating difficult cases of aural suppury rendered this institution one of the most popular of the charities of the metropolis, and accounts for the continued improvement in its resources.

ROYAL FREE HOSPITAL.—On Tuesday the twenty-fourth annual general meeting was held at the board room of the Long Mr. Gray's-inn road W. Pritchard, Esq., High Bailiff of Southwark, in the chair. The report stated that there had been a decided improvement in the resources of the charity. The quarterly board received several large legacies, which had enabled them to pay off £2000 on the mortgage. The annual subscriptions had increased, but the donations had fallen short of the amount received during the previous year. The receipts were, for legacies, donations, and annual subscriptions, £1765 16s. 4d.; the expenditure showed that £2000 of the mortgage, as well as £1941 17s. 10d. of old debts, had been paid off. The remainder was paid for current expenses. There, however, still remained an accumulated arrear, owing to the great demand upon the hospital, occasioned by nearly 3000 patients more during the past than in the previous year. The numbers were 30,940 out-patients, and 680 in-patients, making a total of 30,620 relieved during the year 1851. The committee expressed a hope of being able very shortly to re-open a ward containing forty additional beds.

ROYAL ORTHOPÆDIC HOSPITAL, BLOOMSBURY-SQUARE.—The Earl of Shaftesbury, president of the above charity, has intimated his willingness to preside over the ensuing anniversary of the hospital, at the Albion Tavern. During the year just ended the peculiar and valuable benefits of this charity have been dispensed to an increasing number of the afflicted, and the funds have decreased, although greatly disproportionate to the claims of the afflicted, and confident hopes are entertained that the efforts of the committee under the present favourable auspices will satisfactorily meet the wants of the case.

DISPENSARY FOR CONSUMPTION AND DISEASES OF THE CHEST.—The annual meeting was held on Monday, at the dispensary, Margaret-street, Cavendish-square; Dr. Hastings in the chair. From the report it appeared that 224 new cases had been registered since the last meeting, making a total from the commencement of 3169 patients, and 284 patients were then attending the dispensary. The income amounted during the past year to £304 7s. 7d., and the disbursements to £349 10s. 4d., and the liabilities unpaid amounted to £368 17s. 1d. There were 1200 out-patients. The funds have also increased, although greatly disproportionate to the claims of the afflicted, and confident hopes are entertained that the efforts of the committee under the present favourable auspices will satisfactorily meet the wants of the case.

ROYAL JENNERIAN AND LONDON VACCINE INSTITUTION.—The annual meeting was held on Friday week, at the freemasons' Tavern; Mr. W. H. Aspland in the chair. The report stated that, during the past year 7650 persons had been vaccinated by the officers of the institution, which was an increase of 400 over the preceding year, making a total of 341,614 persons who had been vaccinated since the foundation of the institution. The expenses of the last year were £310, to which the public had only contributed £286. The total receipts for the year were £307.

ROYAL GENERAL ANNUITY SOCIETY.—At the annual meeting, last Monday—Mr. Bevan in the chair—it was stated in the report that during the past year thirteen additional persons had been elected on the funds of the society. Out of a list of 123 candidates, six more were elected at the meeting. During the past year 24 of the annuitants had died, two of whom were 87, and the youngest 72. The amount paid to the pensioners in 1851 was £1188 10s., the largest for nineteen years; but the subscriptions and donations had fallen off. Mr B B. Cabell, M.P., will preside at the anniversary festival on the 14th of February. A great reduction had taken place in the expenditure. The society relieves decayed merchants, bankers, professional men, master manufacturers, tradesmen, clerks, artists, and single females, the daughters of these classes, who have seen better days.

BUILDERS' BENEVOLENT INSTITUTION.—On Tuesday a meeting was held at the offices of the institution, Bream's-buildings, Chancery-lane, to arrange the plan for carrying the same into effect, founded in the year 1847, for granting pension and giving relief to the decayed members of the various branches of the building profession, and that they had now on the funds eight annuitants, the income belonging to the charity not extending to the claims of the numerous applicants. At the anniversary festival on the 14th inst. the committee had determined to hold another at Willis's Rooms, on the 19th proximo, under the patronage of the president, Thomas Cubitt, M.P., the Right Hon. Sir Bulwer Lytton, Bart., M.P., in the chair, supported by Mr. Charles Dickens, Mr. John Leech, Mr. Charles Knight, Mr. Peter Cunningham, Mr. Walting, Mr. Harmer, Mr. Mark Lemon, Mr. Bradbury, Mr. Evans, &c. The funded capital in 1850, was £1250, and there are two pensioners, one a female and the other a male, receiving respectively £10 and £16 each. Mr. Terry, one of the managers, Mr. Charles Dickens, Mr. Walting, Mr. Harmer, Mr. Knight, &c., addressed the company. The subscriptions amounted to £160.

INCORPORATION OF FINSBURY.—A meeting of the members of the Finsbury Incorporation Association was held on Wednesday night, at 17, Southampton-buildings; William Sandford, Esq., of Barnsbury-park, in the chair. It was resolved that the committee appointed to prepare a statement of the constitution and functions of the municipal corporations as laid down in the several Municipal Corporation Acts, together with a statement of the powers which it would be incurred in obtaining a charter, be requested to report at the next meeting

THE ENGINEERS' STRIKE.—A very numerous meeting of the workmen in the various branches of the iron trade was held in St. Martin's Hall, last Monday; Mr. Musto in the chair. Lord Goderich, Messrs. Vansittart, Hughes, and M. Chevallier were on the platform. Mr. Peter Graves, and Mr. Brown attended, the latter as the accredited agent from Paris. The meeting of the kingdom is the largest that has been held for some time. The numbers registered in the quarter, were only 12,996 were registered in the quarter of 1850.

METEOROLOGICAL OBSERVATIONS.—At the Royal Observatory, Greenwich, the mean of the readings of the barometer was 30.213 in. on Sunday; the mean of the week was 29.988 in. The mean daily temperature was above the average of the corresponding days in ten years on every day of the week, and the mean of the whole week was 4.7 deg. above the average, or 81 deg. above the average; on the two following days it was about 4.3 deg., or 6 deg. above the average. The mean temperature of the week was 41.8 deg., which is 4.2 deg. above the average. The wind blew generally from the south-west.

SALE OF RARE BOOKS.—Messrs. Sotheby and Wilkinson have concluded a sale of some valuable books, among which may be enumerated a Missal of the fifteenth century, a beautiful manuscript, splendidly painted upon vellum, by Verard, and said to be unique, from the circumstance of its having sixteen miniatures, the five other known copies possessing only thirteen. It produced £49 10s. Blake's "Book of Urizen," containing twenty-seven of his singular designs, in the manner of Knight, a large-paper copy of Ashmole's "Order of the Garter," £11 11s. A fine copy of the "Biblia Polyglotta Walton," with Castell's Lexicon, and having the rare dedication to Charles II., realised £8 8s. Alexander's "Monasticon Anglicanum," by Dugdale, Bandinel, with Old St. Paul's, £44. Gough's "Sepulchral Monuments," a very choice copy, and remarkably free from the usual stains, £67 10s. The series of Ledger's Views, on large paper, sold for £20 10s. Lysons' Roman Remains, Nichols's "Bibliotheca Topographica Britannica," wanting some supplemental parts, £33 10s. Montfaucon's "Antiquité Expliquée," on large paper, £35. An Italian manuscript, "Cronica," on vellum, of considerable interest, £20 10s.

THE ELECTRIC POLICE.—"An electric shock was sent through the whole of the suspected population of Berlin on the night of the 30th," writes the correspondent of the Times from that capital, "by way of experiment; and it began to be feared at one time that the police would be too much for the secret agent. All persons who have been, by legal sentence, placed under surveillance as part of their punishment, are bound to sleep at home every night, and are liable to be visited at any time by order of the police, to discover whether they are not abroad for professional purposes. On the above night an order sent down shot from the central police-office to all the revieurs of the city at once to make an instant visitation of every "suspected" person in each district. It was done forthwith, and as those not found at their respective addresses, according to the regulations, were arrested next day, and sent to the House of Correction. The dread of this visitation must undoubtedly long over this portion of the population. As the district police themselves do not know of the order till the moment it is to be executed, the objects of the visit cannot possibly get notice of it, which, it is said, sometimes tend to occur.

BANQUETS AT THE MANSION HOUSE.—On Wednesday evening the Court of Aldermen, the Recorder, the Sheriffs, and their ladies, were entertained at the Mansion House. Covers were laid in the Long Parlour for seventy; but, owing to indisposition, the Lady Mayoress was unable to be present. Yesterday the Lord Mayor, according to ancient custom, received at dinner the Master, Wardens, and Court of Assistants of the Fishmongers' Company, together with the Deputy and Common Council of Coleman-street (his Lordship's) ward.

COURT OF COMMON COUNCIL.—In the course of the election of officers annually appointed by the court, Tuesday, a strong opposition was evinced to effect a reform in the sale of offices under the corporation, and to do away with the exactions of officials in the shifting or merger of corn and flour. The report of the Corporation Committee was also presented. The duties have amounted to £13,090 10s., which have been settled for £38,838 10s. Amongst many improvements in the streets and public ways, mention is made of the discount £42,405. 3s. for improved dwellings and lodging-houses for the poor. The Lord Mayor acknowledged the receipt from the Royal Commissioners of the Exhibition medal for the corporation. Votes of 100 guineas each, in aid of the life-boat fund of the Shipwrecked Fishermen and Mariners' Royal Benevolent Society, and the Guardian Society's Ladies Penitentiary, were passed.

LONDON AND GREENWICH RAILWAY.—The half-yearly meeting of this company was held on Tuesday at the offices in Coleman-street. W. Shenbolt, Esq., in the chair. The accounts were passed, and from them it appeared that the amount available for a dividend was £9242 14s. 10d. The dividend of 4s 3d per share was agreed to.

THE GOLD COINAGE MINES OF COBRE.—The half yearly meeting was held on Tuesday, at the offices, Austin-friars, City; Mr. Russell Ashe in the chair. The report stated that owing to the very heavy rains and other causes there had been a deficiency in the quantity of produce since their last meeting. Place of business, Austin-friars. Capital £250,000, in shares of £2 per share.

AFFAIRS OF FRANCE.—At a meeting on Tuesday, at the large hall, Cowper-street, City-road, strong resolutions were passed against the system of "blind support to new usurped supreme Presidential Powers," and expressing sympathy for the cause of liberty abroad. General Haug, who it was stated had fought for freedom at Vienna and Rome, was one of the speakers.

EXPEDITION TO CENTRAL AFRICA.—The friends of this expedition will be glad to learn that supplies have been sent out to enable the travellers to undertake the important part of the journey from Bornou to the shores of the Indian Ocean. Lord Palmerston had liberally granted a further sum of £300 for the purpose, which, after having received the sanction of Dr. Barth's journey to Adamowa, and of Dr. Overweg's exploration of Lake Tsad and the Biddoma Is ands. Instructions have been forwarded, too, by the Foreign office to Captain Blundell, the British agent in Zanzibar, to supply all the wants of the travellers as soon as they shall make their appearance on the coast. Dr. Thorntons, a request of Dr. Overweg for a supply of certain English goods that he required

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

THE KAFFIR WAR.—General Cathcart, accompanied by his staff, will take his passage for the Cape from Portsmouth in a few days in her Majesty's steam sloop of war Hydra, Commander Belgrave, which is about to proceed to Simon's Bay to remain on that station. The new Mund rifles ordered for the Cape are not to be confined to the 43d Reg ment, as stated, but will be distributed amongst the best marksmen of the different regiments engaged. First Lieutenant Arthur Cecil Gore Gravile, of the 60th Rifles, serving at the Cape, is appointed Second Aide-de-Camp to the Governor, General Cathcart. Three waggons loaded with ba l cartridge, with 1 mounted sergeant, 1 trumpeter, 6 gunners and drivers, with 12 horses, and one non-commissioned officer, and 6 dismounted gunners as e cort, left the Royal Arsenal on Saturday last, under the command of Lieutenant Barry, of the 3 Field-battery, for the Brooklyn's' Arms railway terminus, for conveyance by special train to Portsmouth, where they will be shipped on board the Hydra steam-loop for the Cape of Good Hope. Major-General the Hon. George Catheart arrived in town on Tuesday morning from Windsor Castle. The General had an interview with Earl Grey in the afternoon, at the Colonial-office.

THE DEFENCES OF THE COUNTRY.—Several gentlemen of the Stock Exchange have agreed to form a rifle club, to meet for practice at Woolwich, where the authorities have placed at their disposal proper spots for the firing. The subscription of members will be £2 2s. per annum, of which £1 1s. is to be appropriated to prizes f r the best shots, and £1 is for general expenses. Each member is to provide himself with a rifle, and to pay for such ammunition as he may use. The committee will engage an eminent rifle-maker to supply efficient rifles at a moderate cost, and competent instructors in rifle shooting will be on the ground when required. None but members or subscribers will be allowed to be present at the ordinary practice, but meetings will be fixed when members' friends may attend. The club to be managed by a committee selected by the members AUGMENTATION OF THE ARMY.—It is now certain that an augmentation of the army will take place. We understand that within the last few days orders have been issued to raise recruits in anticipation of the augmentation. The number, it is now said, will be in the infantry, and will, we hear, be effected by raising all regiments at home from 750 to 1000 rank and file each. Some other changes are to be made, but we understand that the entire augmentation will be about 10,000 men: no officers are, it is said, to be added. This measure in detail will be shortly published. Daily News.

THE ENGLISH FLEET.—Orders are said to have been sent out recalling to England three of the Peninsula ships commanded by admirals, and as many of the vessels which contribute to form our fleet in the Mediterranean.—Daily News.

A commission, consisting of Major General Carden, of the Royal Engineers, Colonel Colquhoun, of the Royal Artillery; and Sir E Belcher, R.N., has been appointed to examine and report on the state of the defences in the Channel Islands.

REDUCED MEANS OF ARMING OF THE RURAL POLICE.—A rumour has obtained currency amongst the rural constabulary, within the last few days, that the Government have it in contemplation to arm the various bodies of the county police in the kingdom with cutlasses and bayonets, after the manner of the Irish constabulary, and that the constables will in future be enlisted for a period of seven years.—Manchester Courier

THE FRENCH ARMY.—The United Service Gazette has the following: "It is rumoured in well-informed quarters, that, in the budget to be presented to the French Legislature upon its assembling, a proposal will be made, emanating from the highest authority in the Republic, for the reduction of the French army. This, taken in connexion with the pacific tone of the circular to the European powers, ought to disarm apprehension."

THE "PRESERVED" MEAT.—The Hecla, arrived on Friday week at Portsmouth from the coast of Africa, has brought home 2377 lbs. of Goldner's "preserved meats" to return—5959lb from Ascension, and 1848 lb. from Sierra Leone. The character given this stuff by those who have been "condemned" to partake of it, is worse than any yet ascribed to it.

NAVAL ARCHITECTURE.—THE NAVY.—The Admiralty have ordered the Windsor Castle, of 124 guns, now building at Pembroke, to be cut in two amidships, in order to introduce about 23 feet of midship body, and also to be lengthened aloft to receive the screw and engines of 800-horse power made by Mr. Robert Napier, of Glasgow, originally for the Simoom. The Royal Albert, 120, building at Woolwich, it is said, is also to be adapted for the screw, to be propelled by the engines and screw now in the Simoom. Sea-going ships, the Euphrates, thus bringing into use some of the engines of power now lying on hand.

THE LOSS OF THE "AMAZON."

On Monday an official investigation was commenced at the Privy Council-office by the naval department of the Board of Trade, Captains Beechey, Walker, and Henderson, under the act 14th and 15th Vict., cap. 79, which came into force only a few days before the destruction of the Amazon. The act provides that, when it is reported that a vessel is lost, the owners are to give notice to the board, under a penalty of £50. Inspectors may be appointed to investigate the nature of accidents; and the 23d section enacts that an inspector, or any person a member of the naval department of the board, in all cases of accident or damage, may make such inquiries, and require answers or returns thereto, as to the nature, circumstance, and causes of the same, as he shall think necessary, and may summon to appear the attendance and examination of any and all parties. Beyond ten miles, persons are to be first paid their expenses. The present investigation will include the seaworthiness of the vessel and the machinery. Captain Beechey having explained the object of the inquiry, Mr. Lloyd, the Admiralty Superintendent of Packets at Southampton, gave evidence as to the duties of inspection. He had to see to the mustering of the crew. The Admiralty let the vessel to the contractors, and they saw that the hull and machinery were in good order, and from the captain a paper as to the ship's equipment. He went over the Amazon, but did not muster the crew, as he was unable to attend on the 31st of December, and was not a shipping inspector. The Amazon seemed to him to have a very good crew, and quite sufficient in numbers. He had merely examined the fitness of the ship to go to sea, and had not required into the stores provided on board for engineers' use. The state of the boilers and the bulkheads did not fall within his duty, nor could he say whether the painting of the woodwork had been finished when the ship left Southampton, or whether she had the proper complement of boats. Her draught of water was, he believed, 21 feet. He gave an unfavourable opinion of the keel cranes used, as, in such an emergency, the discipline of the naval service could alone prevent disastrous consequences resulting from the employment of them. Those who were in the boats were naturally afraid that others would take their places if they got out in order to clear them from these keel cranes. Captain Corry concluded by stating that he was unable to say whether there was any quantity of lime on board when the Amazon left. He had never heard any evidence of a pubsequent to Southampton that the ship was unfit for sea when she started. During the remainder of the sitting, Captain Beechey and Captain Walker examined closely Angus M Inney, engineer's storekeeper, Isaac Roberts, the boiler-maker; William Nutman, Thomas Allwood, Lieutenant Grylls, Mr. Neilson, and Mr. Wil iam Angus. They al. adhered substantially to their previously recorded statements, the only point worth mentioning being that the origin of the flames between the starboard fore boiler and the bulkhead was more positively asserted than formerly, and that the causes which could have led to a fire there was not known in any quarter of the river. One witness Alwood modified his previous evidence, so as to render it reconcilable with that of Messrs. Roberts, and Angus. He now says that he first saw the flames coming from the store room, but that they might have originated between the boiler and bulkhead beneath.

On Tuesday the inquiry was resumed. Charles Long, T Dunford, J. Shearing, W Sloane, C. Rowe, Long, G. Tapscott, and Mr. Vincent, were examined, but no new facts were disclosed. Mr. Vincent was closely examined by the board as to his leaving the ship, as to the efforts he had used to save others when in the life-boat, and, last of all, as to the part he took when he first reached Plymouth His replies were, that the Captain had ordered the boats to be lowered, as there was no hope of saving the ship; that it was only when the life-boat was in perfect safety that he personally left the ship; that he could not conceive it to be his duty to leave Plymouth as quickly as possible, to report the loss of the steamer, leaving Messrs. Fox to look after the survivors, although his own impression, and that of those saved with him, was that they alone had been saved.

On Wednesday the witnesses examined were Mr. Glennie, a passenger, Webb, Berryman, Cook, Brown, Edwards, Kingdom, Gamblin, Hoo, who left charge of the engines; and Fox, Stone, and Lammond, employed in the engine-room. Nothing new was elicited; but it appeared that a foreboding existed in nearly every mind, that some calamity would occur. The inquiry was adjourned till next Tuesday.

STORMS ON THE COAST.—SHIPWRECKS.

During the whole of Saturday and the succeeding night, and again on Monday and Tuesday, the Channel, and also the Yorkshire and Lancashire coasts, were swept by tempests which sometimes approached the violence of a hurricane, and were attended with fatal results both to life and property

The gale of Saturday night was especially violent in the Channel. The new West India steamer Orrasco, on its passage from London to Southampton, experienced its full fury. The gale came on just as the Orrasco passed Dover. The sea washed over her bulwarks, and, for three hours, although her engines were going at full speed, she was enabled to make but little way ahead. She took eight hours in running the twenty miles from the Foreland to Dungeness. Not a person was ventured to appear on deck during the whole night. She proved a splendid sea boat, or she could not have lived out the gale. She came up Southampton Water on Sunday afternoon after her fierce encounter with the hurricane of the preceding night in a splendid style. We shall engrave this fine vessel next week) At Southampton it blew with tremendous fury the whole of Saturday night, so much so that the French mail-boat from that port was unable to put to sea until the next morning. Serious disasters are reported as having occurred during the storm at different points of the coast. Between Cromer and Yarmouth, a fine brig called the Gazele, Mr. Rossell, master, belonging to Stockton, on a voyage to the Thames from Hartlepool, encountered the formidable gale She sprang a leak; and the most vigorous working of the crew at the pumps failed in reducing the water. Tremendous seas kept breaking over her, sweeping the decks, and carrying away everything moveable. As the evening advanced she lost her steerage, and, catching a heavy blast of wind, went over on her beam-ends, and instantly foundered in some eight or ten fathoms of water. The crew had not the least means of preserving themselves, and, with the exception of the master, every soul on board perished. Mr. Russell contrived to make his way up the rigging as the vessel was going down. He sea ted himself in the crosstrees, and after being in that position upwards of twelve hours, he was taken off by the Kennard, and the Diligence which was proceeding thither. When rescued he was in a most exhausted condition. Early on the morning of Saturday another deplorable catastrophe occurred, on the same coast. The Elizabeth, Mr. Nagle master, which was coming across from the Tyne for London, came in collision with a bark in the last, and the bark within five minutes afterwards foundered in deep water with every soul on board. The Elizabeth took shelter in Whitby. The Scottish Kingdom, a fine new coal vessel thirty miles from the entrance of the Thames, was the scene of a deplorable wreck. A schooner, named the Anne and Elizabeth, from Mogador to London, in beating up the Channel, was driven on the Kentish Knock, and the vessel and cargo which was previously destroyed all chance of getting her off. She speedily became a wreck, and a passenger and the master were lost. The remainder of the crew and a second passenger were preserved by the Alpha, of Barking, which sent her hyna for Harwich, and landed them. During the gale the crew of the Earl of Erroll, bound to Boulogne, which had sprung a leak and had foundered, sought refuge on the Kentish Knock light-vessel, and were subsequently conveyed to Deal. In the upper parts of the Swin several sunken wrecks have been observed, but the fate of the crews has not transpired.

The accounts from the Welsh coast speak of the gale having been very destructive. The Leeds Dublin steam-ship was abandoned on Saturday, be tween Liverpool and Dublin, waterlogged, the crew and pass-ngers having been taken off and brought to Liverpool by an American ship. She was sighted on Sunday morning about 25 miles N. by W. from the light-ship, not having then foundered.

The gale of Monday and Tuesday spent its fury chiefly on the Yorkshire coast. Where there was a possible loss of vessels, it was the case on Tuesday morning, a boat, manned by six beachmen, put off from Scarborough to the assistance of a ship in distress in the offing, and had scarcely passed the pier-head when she was capsized, and the whole of the crew perished. Five have all left wives and families to deplore their loss. Not far from the same port, the Joseph Fenton, of Whitby, went down during the gale, but the crew succeeded in getting away in their boat, and were picked up several hours afterwards by a brig. In the neighbourhood of Orfordness a brig was lost; fate of the crew uncertain. Between the Ness and Aldborough, on the same morning, about two o'clock, the crew of the Freesberry, Mr. Smith, bound to companion from Inverkeithing, was with difficulty saved from the wreck. On Monday night, the Frederick, bound to Boulogne, took the ground near Thorp Ness, and became a wreck before it could be relieved by the steamers from Harwich. The Ann, of Whitby, from the northern coast, the Grow, from Sunderland, encountered the full fury of the storm some thirty or forty miles from Flamborough Head, and both vessels, it is feared, scarcely got away from the vessel in the boat ere she went down. Many other casualties are reported to have occurred in the vicinity of the northern ports.

Notwithstanding the protection from the weather usually found in the Downs, the gales seemed to have caused much damage to the shipping riding in that safe haven, and, coming in contact with each other, sustained considerable damage. The ship Ramilies, for the Cape of Good Hope, was obliged to run back from the Dungeness Roads. Lower down the Channel the gale appears to have continued with uninterrupted severity. A large fleet took refuge in the Portland Roads, windbound.

ORIGINAL RECORD OF THE DISCOVERY OF AMERICA BY COLUMBUS, FOUND AT SEA.

The following statement, quoted in the Times of Thursday week, from a Savanna (United States) journal, has called forth the interesting corroborative testimony as to the genuineness of the relic which is appended to the statement itself, as given by the Savanna paper:—

Captain D'Auberville, of the bark Guerlain, of Boston, writes to the editor of the Lavanelle Verte under the date of the 17th of August last to repair some damages his vessel had sustained, and, while waiting, himself and two of his passengers crossed the straits to Mount Abylos, on the African coast, to shoot, and pick up zoological specimens. Before returning, the vessel had freshened so much as to render it necessary to put more ballast into the boat, and one of the crew lifted what he supposed to be a piece of rock, but from its extreme lightness, on examining it more closely, he found it was a chest. The captain to it, who first took it for a piece of pumicestone, but so completely covered with barnacles and other marine animalcules as to deny that supposition. On further examination he found it to be a box. On opening it he found a cocoanut, enveloped in a kind of gum or resinous substance; this he also opened, and found a parchment covered with Gothic characters, figures, and signs, which he could not read. The vessel had now been able to decipher. He found, on shore an Armenian book-merchant, who was said to be the most learned man in Spain, to whom he took it, who, after long study, succeeded in discovering the following key for to wind off the coil of parchment, and found it to be a piece of vellum, about 2 feet wide and 5 feet long, and covered with characters, which, when deciphered, proved to be a letter addressed to Ferdinand and Isabel a of Castile and Aragon, saying the ships could not possibly survive the tempest another day; that they were between the Western Isles and Cipango, and that the narrative was written in duplicate, in case one carrival should go to the bottom, that some mariner might pick up one or the other of them. The strange document was signed by Christopher Columbus, and was dated "Flashing Island, 13th of August, 1492," and consequently had been floating over the Atlantic 358 years The letter closes with an assurance from the writer that he would guard his treasure safe until his return to the United States, when would be in April or May next.

Sir,—In your paper of Thursday a paragraph was inserted, extracted from a Savanna (United States) journal, stating that an American captain had picked up on the African coast, near Mount Abylos, a singular relic—being no less than a cedar keg, containing a parchment upon which was found to be a short but concise account of the discovery of Cathay, or further India, written and signed by Christopher Columbus, and addressed to Ferdinand and Isabella, in old volume of voyages in my possession I find the following passages, which distinctly alludes to the fact of the great geographical discoverer having prepared such a document, and, after depositing it in a cask, throwing it overboard, with a view of an account of his success reaching the knowledge of the sovereign, had his vessels, as he anticipated, failed to survive the tempest they then encountered. Appended is an extract detailing the circumstances, which, if you think it worthy of a place in your columns, is quite at your service.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

Lombard-street, Saturday evening. D. MORIER EVANS.

"The admiral, being more skilful in reckoning, found their run 150 leagues less than the others. Tuesday, the 12th February, 1493, he met a violent wind with great and dangerous storms, and he drove most of the night without any sail; afterwards he set a little sail. The waves broke and the ship laboured. The next morning the wind slackened, and on Wednesday night it rose again with dreadful waves, which hindered the ships' way so that he could not work them. The admiral kept under a mainsprsail reefed, on y to keep the ship to the wave; but, perceiving the storm to increase, he let it run before the wind, there being no other remedy. Then the carvel Pinta began to run, and disappeared, though the admiral kept his light aboard the whole night, and the Pinta answered. Thursday, at day-break, the storm was more fierce, the wind blew fiercer, and they were more fearful of perishing, with the trouble of believing that the carvel Pinta was already lost. The admiral finding himself near death, to the end that a memory might remain of their faithful services and of what he had done in their service, he wrote as much as he could of what he had discovered on a skin of parchment, and having wrapped it up in a piece of cerecloth he put it into a wooden cask and cast it into the sea, all the men thinking it had been some piece of devotion, and not sensible the wind slackened. Friday, the 15th of February, they saw land ahead, bearing from them east-north-west. Some said it was the island Madeira, others that it was the Rock of Cintra, near Lisbon; but when they neared the land they were the islands Azoros. They pied to and iro with much labour, but could not come up with the island of St. Mary. The admiral's legs being very uneasy because he had been exposed to the rain and cold, he slept a little, and on the 18th came to an anchor on the north side of the island, which they found to be St. Mary."

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS FOR THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

Heaviness again prevailed on Monday in the English Market; Consols, however, alternating during the day between 96 and 96¼, closing at the last quotation, and consequently 1 in advance of the last price of the preceding week. Opening at the same rate on Tuesday, a demand for shut improved quotations to 96⅝, and no unfavourable news transpired to check this rise, which was not only maintained on Wednesday, but a further improvement to 96¾ was quoted, the closing figures being 96⅞. Money. On Thursday the market opened more cheerfully for Money but the news of the Marquis of Normanby having received his office of Ambassador to the French nation caused a reaction. Consols gradually receding to 96¼ for Money. This feeling of heaviness has since prevailed in the Market, closing yesterday (Saturday) afternoon at 96¼ for money value, of 58s. to 61s. prem.; and Bank Stock is firm, at 217 to 216; India Bonds are also firm, at 69s. to 72s; Reduced close at 97⅝; and Three-and-a-Quarter per Cents, 98⅛; India Stock for account, 261 to 264.

Mexican was better on Monday, a communication having been received from M. Facconnet that he had succeeded in arranging for the payment of the January dividend. The price rose from 29⅛ to 30⅛. Ecuador also improved 3⅛. Sardinian was 88¾. The Spanish Committee Certificates are now dealt in (need it be said, speculatively?) at 1¼ per cent. Heaviness, and an inactive market, damped prices on Tuesday; Mexican declined to 29¾ 30. Spanish New Issue forced quoted 17⅞, but on Wednesday more activity prevailed, Mexican again improving to 30⅛ for Money; Ecuador, 3⅛. On Thursday there were transactions at 29 in Mexican, at 30⅛ 31 Ecuador, 3⅛; Granada Deferred, 4¾; and Dutch Two-and-a-half per Cents, 65¾. The nominal price of Brazilian at last dates of the week was 99, Portuguese Four per Cents, 83½; Russian Four-and-a-Half per Cents, 100¾; Spanish Five per Cents, 23¾; Three per Cents, 40¾; New Deferred, 17⅝; Dutch Four per Cents, 99⅛.

Railway stock has been tolerably well supported, and the arrangement for the Account passed off with facility, tending rather to improve prices.

MURRAY'S MODERN COOKERY

New ready, printed in a large clear type, with New Illustrative Woodcuts, Post 8vo, 6s, strongly bound,

MODERN DOMESTIC COOKERY, Founded upon Principles of Economy and Practical Knowledge, and adapted for Private Families.

"No Housekeeper ought to be without this book, which is adapted to every grade of society—the rich, the middle classes, and the poor" The Times Advertiser

"The value of 'Murray's Modern Domestic Cookery' consists in its plainness and practicability. The experiments, and unpractical character of the fashionable modern cookery books had led us to fear that a great deal too much of the national time would be wasted in culinary trifling. For the honour of Britain cooks, and for the comfort of British digestion, Mr. Murray comes forward to the rescue."—Literary Gazette

"One of the most practically useful books we have seen on the subject."—British Critic

"It is impossible to speak too highly of the exceeding beauty of this work."—Cambridge Chronicle

JOHN MURRAY, Albemarle-street

Now ready, Fourth Edition, post 8vo, 12s,

VISITS to the MONASTERIES of the LEVANT. By the Hon. ROBERT CURZON, jun. With numerous Illustrations.

"This work will be a most welcome addition to the stock of 'Travels in the East,' and chiefly because it differs essentially from any which have ever before been published. Mr. Curzon has made the character or the mode of handling it be considered. Its trait of thoroughly out-of-the-way and almost untrodden spots and scenes, and, in obtaining access to ventures which befel him in his rambles in the East in quest of ancient manuscripts, the author has evinced by several of the readers of his rapid-and-twenty chapters of most agreeable writing, replete with information on most interesting points. The result is this delectable book, a bright and lively addition to English with a happy and a cheerful mind "—Times.

JOHN MURRAY, Albemarle-street.

Now ready, Sixth Edition, corrected, and improved by the insertion of all the authorities, 1 volume, 8vo, 15s,

THE BOOK of the CHURCH. By the late ROBERT SOUTHEY, LL.D.

"Contains a most interesting sketch of a subject which, to the general reader, is almost unknown and, in a manner, dull to be popular, from the beauty of its execution, will, I trust, have the effect of turning the attention of persons who have hitherto been quite indifferent to such matters, through ignorance, to the nature of the dangers which this country has escaped, and the blessings of various kinds which have been secured to it, through the National Church Establishment. —Archbishop Howley to the Author.

NEW WORK BY THE AUTHOR OF "BERTHA'S JOURNAL."

Now ready, 3 vols, 12mo, 31s,

THE HEIRESS in her MINORITY: a Work for Young Persons; or, the Progress of Character. By the Author of "Bertha's Journal, during a Visit to her Uncle in England."

"In this work there is a due admixture of religious instruction of a higher class—more practical, and evincing a greater degree of learning than in most works of the same stamp. On the stand that book is a small readable, compressed cyclopedia, with a copious index and distinct chapter headings—a very mine for youth, and a happy antidote for the restless hours of a wet day in a country house, when 'out and in' are forbidden, the skipping-rope is laid aside and the grass, the children's playground, scenery, and other amusements of the same genus, are impossible. Then take up these green-covered volumes, ye restless boys, and sit down in the window-seat to revel in the beauties of the insects, and the birds, and the glorious flowers, which the Author of Holiness brings before you."—Morning Chronicle.

MR. CUMMING'S ADVENTURES.

Now ready, Third Edition, 2 vols, post 8vo, 24s,

FIVE YEARS' LION HUNTING in SOUTH AFRICA, with Adventures amongst the Wild Beasts and Persons of the Far interior. By R GORDON CUMMING, Esq., of Altyre. With numerous Illustrations of the Chase.

"After reading, where such was readily applicable, every fact recorded by Mr Cumming regarding the habits and anecdotes of the living animals by what is known of their anatomical structure, we have found his statements, with one unimportant exception, to be correct, and that he has very ignorance of the organisation, which would suggest to the physiologist the habits and actions portrayed in the book. Cloth gilt, The best testimony to the accuracy of the hunter's sketches."—Quarterly Review

"We feel bound to say that we give entire credit to the truthfulness of the book, which is really one of extraordinary interest after its kind "—Quarterly Review

"The style is so natural and fresh from the scene, the scene itself in the fair interior of Africa so new, and the hazards attending the chase of the formidable beasts of those wilds so great, that it is difficult to lay the volume down until the last page, and even then we very rapidly follow one another, has been ascertained. In fact, the narrative has the charm of a vivid romance and the profound novelty may study with any the native spring of its snowy style."—Quarterly Review.

MURRAY'S READING FOR THE RAIL.

This day, with numerous Woodcuts, post 8vo, 5s,

DR. LAYARD'S own NARRATIVE of his DISCOVERIES at NINEVEH. Abridged by Himself for popular circulation.

"The various attempts that have been made to give popular descriptions of Mr Layard's great discoveries have taught him and his publisher the necessity of placing an account of them in a popular form within the reach of all. Well has he done this task, and well has the publisher brought the work before the public."—Economist

JOHN MURRAY, Albemarle-street.

This day, 2 vols, post 8vo, 24s,

A FAGGOT of FRENCH STICKS. By the Author of "Bubbles from the Brunnen of Nassau"

"Sir Francis Head, eschewing gaudies and invitations, neglected his friend, suffered his letters of introduction to rest in his portmanteau, and passed his three weeks of May in visiting the public buildings and galleries of Paris, and in making such numerical notes that was worth seeing in the French capital and its faubourgs. To see so much, to so short a time, required, we need not say, early rising, and no small degree of activity. Both were with him to his taste. His kindly spirit and minute observation for which he is distinguished, and, set his return to England, that his notes and reminiscences into volumes, summoning to his aid the easy, cheerful style and sly humour which have long procured him a numerous and admiring audience in the care of a lovers of a genial and amusing book We rejoice that this book is one we can honestly praise."—Morning Herald

SUPPLEMENT

VOL. XX.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING SATURDAY JANUARY 31, 1852. [GRATIS.

DESTINY:

OR. THE DREAM OF DEATH.

BY MAHMOUZ EFFENDI.

"There are more things in heaven and earth, Horatio.

[illegible] yet for this once. [illegible] I will be squared [illegible]

"How now? even so quickly may one [illegible] NIGHT.

ABOUT fifteen years ago the plague raged intensely in the Levant. Among other places, the city of Smyrna suffered much from this scourge, which is known to the natives of Anadoli by the name of the Youmourjak. But heavy as the visitation undoubtedly was, Smyrna may still be considered as, perhaps, somewhat favoured by Destiny, since, looking to certain Consular Bills of Mortality, the Angel of Death seems at the time in question to have passed in a rather more merciful mood over the meandering banks of the Meles than along the Nile in the south, or the Golden Horn in the north. Yet, as we have already declared, Smyrna suffered much, very much.

The wild and extensive flat, and low open ground—situate to the eastward of Windmill Point—and scarcely indeed above the level of the waters of the little bay which here, in military phrase, "turns the flank" of the north and extreme end of the sea-front of the city, became very soon after the first outburst of "La Peste" studded with the tattered and unhappy tents of the "compromised;" and, moreover, the city hospitals, especially that of St. Roque, rapidly filled to overflowing.

The Franks, ever strict believers, as a body, in the efficacy of Quarantine, shut up their trembling families in Bujah and Bournabat, and even hurriedly formed a cordon sanitaire round the former of these villages; while within the town of Smyrna itself, in its wide-spread network of narrow streets, almost every European merchant donned for his daily rounds an anti-contagious oilskin overcoat; and bore also in his hand a trusty and persuasive iron-shod bludgeon, to "fend off" therewith not only the dangerous approach of the reckless loose-robed Sons of the Turban, but, by St. George, to keep even the tight Sons of the Hat, even the dearest kinsmen and friends and acquaintance, at the very respectful distance of arm's length. "Touch me not" was the charitable order of the day; and "the plague is contagious," a phrase in all Christian mouths, except, perhaps, the medicos, who were of course most widely divided in their professional opinions on the subject. Dr. Bulard, a gallant Frenchman, carried the doctrine of non-contagion to such an extent as bravely to immure himself altogether with the patients in one of the Plague Hospitals, many of whom he had the ineffable satisfaction of rescuing from the very jaws of death. In Smyrna he for some time dauntlessly stood his ground unharmed, and subsequently, on receiving pratique, proceeded with a like benevolent purpose to Constantinople—the city of the Sultan—where we unfortunately lost sight of him.

"I THANK YOU, O MURAD! BUT BY THE BEARD OF THE PROPHET, AZRAEL HAS BEEN HERE THIS NIGHT."—DRAWN BY G. THOMAS.

There is one quarter of Smyrna that is tolerably well known to travellers in the East by the name of TURK TOWN. Here the contradictory systems and medicinal precautions of the Franks and their Hekims were, at the period of our story, openly held in contempt and disregarded. Here everything seemed left unreservedly to Fate, to Tukdir or to Kismet. Here the Muslims, even in the Rag Bazaar, bought and sold, and ate and drank, and prayed and slept, and then prayed and bought and sold again, day after day, and week after week, as if the plague were altogether a fiction, and Death had no dominion over mortal man. If any of the shops in the tcharshees became vacant, from their tenant being, as predestined, taken away by the terminator of delights and the separator of companions, some Alee or Omar [illegible]nedly and at once took to the very carpet, or, to be more correct perhaps, stepped into the very shoes of the dead Mustapha or Mehemet; and thus, till all trades were more than decimated, business of any kind was scarcely for a single day interrupted. Numerous fresh graves were, meanwhile, constantly being dug in the cypre[illegible] cemeteries, and the hired reciters of the Koran seemed, to most observers, more than usually active, as well as hoarse and husky in their vocation; yet, notwithstanding these speaking signs, and the frequent loss of many familiar faces in every public haunt and favourite resort, there was still no panic, save, as we have already said, among the Franks.

To use a common English phrase, no one, looking merely at the conduct of the Turks, would have dreamt that the plague was at work within the city of Smyrna. Dreamt, do we say?

Aye; we are dreamers all in some sense; still few have yet dreamt as Selim of Smyrna is recorded to have done at this sad period of the plague. Listen! BISMILLAH! Selim, the slipper-seller, tenanted a shop or dukian in the Papoudj Bazaar, and possessed a private residence in Turk Town, at the top of the steep hill in the vicinity of the Jews' cemetery.

When seated one morning in the bazaar, with his tempting wares around him, his immediate neighbour, Murad, observed that his friend's countenance was, contrary to its usual appearance for years past, excessively sad, and his heart evidently contracted. He remembered also, at the same moment, that for some days Selim had been frequently absent from his dukian, and had, before going away, unaccountably neglected more than once to throw the protective net over his unwatched goods. And his stock of red, white, yellow, blue, and black papoudjes was by no means the least valuable in the bazaar, one indeed offering great temptation to the dishonest. So, shifting his own position a little more to the front, and there comfortably recrossing his legs, Murad slowly turned his turbaned head far enough to bring his single grey eye—for Murad had lost the other by ophthalmia—to bear full upon the countenance and uncombed beard of Selim.

"Bana-bak! look here," cried Murad; upon which Selim raised his head, and ceased counting the beads of the tesbih or rosary he happened at the moment to be passing through his feverish fingers.

"Trade is bad this morning, O Selim; these unsalnted Franks are becoming either poor or miserly. They buy not slippers as they were wont to do. May the soles of their feet be blistered, and —"

"Yavash, yavash!" interrupted Selim. "Be mild, O Murad! The sons of the Franks are not misers; they are at times good customers, but now their livers are all dried up with fear, as mine own is with sorrow."

"Allah Kerim! God is compassionate!" cried Murad. "Why should the infidels fear?"

"Fear you not God? Allahden Korkmazmisen? Yes, yes, Murad, I know you fear Allah. And the Franks——"

"The Franks," said Murad, "fear death. They desert our bazaars. They fly to their villages. They say leather is 'susceptible.' Can the plague, then, be hid in a slipper? Bosh! What foolish word is this now so often on their tongues 'Ouiaslma, ouiaslma!' 'Contagion, contagion.' Allah Kerim! God is compassionate. And the Franks, I repeat, are becoming either cowardly or miserly."

Selim shook his head, for he had many friends among the Franks.

"The plague is among us," resumed Murad; "but God is great! You are alive, and I am alive, and, by the Beard of the Prophet, in the whole bazaar, even in two moons, not a dozen papoudjes have departed for the Garden of Paradise."

"The next papoudjes, O Murad," said Selim, impressively, "will certainly be the friend who now addresses you."

"What words are these?" cried the astonished Murad; "why should you die? And how can the decree of Fate be known to you?"

"I feel that I shall very soon die," rejoined Selim; "and I will presently convey to you the grounds of my presentiment. But I fear not death."

"As the Franks do," murmured Murad.

"Some of them may fear it much; certainly, many of their livers are dried up with apprehension; but is there not a cause? Perhaps they fear death here, since their sons and their daughters and their wives are distant, even a thousand leagues from their own nation and their early home."

"Never mind the Franks," ejaculated Murad, "I like them not, for they slew my two brothers at Navarin. But tell me, O Selim, why you should be the next to ascend to the odours of Paradise? What thing is this? What thoughts are these? Is your head a Karpous, a brainless water-melon? Shadbash! cheer up! why should you die?"

"It is my destiny," answered Selim, "and I bow to fate: I have had a dcush, a dream."

"From the decree of destiny there is no escape," replied Murad, "and the Prophet has declared that dreams are true omens."

"And my dream I will now relate to you," rejoined Selim.

The single grey eye of Murad twinkled in its socket, but his tongue remained silent.

"You have heard," resumed Selim, "that the Khanum," (thus he referred to his wife), "together with her infant, died last week of the Plague—Allah's will be done. Well, my whole household, the Khanum and myself included, consisted but of seven souls. Some thirteen nights ago, I dreamt that AZRAEL came to my abode, and that exactly seven dead bodies were carried out of my house, each covered with a red pall, and I suddenly awoke in terror and tribulation. There were as I have said, but just seven souls under my roof."

"Of whom you have lost two," interrupted Murad. "God is compassionate, and the rest may be spared to you."

"No;" continued Selim, mournfully, "the dream is already almost literally fulfilled. Six, six, have already been taken by the Plague. I am the seventh!"

Murad's face lengthened with astonishment, and great was his anxiety for his friend.

"I related my dream this morning to Aziz, our opposite neighbour, who is now angrily addressing that ill-looking Arab, seemingly half asleep on the mastabah before the shop, and obstructing the approach of customers. I have now told you, O Murad, and——"

Murad was about to make some observation, but Selim interrupted him.

"With your permission," continued he, "let me first finish my narration. I thought at one time, yesterday, of purchasing a black slave or two at the market just behind this tcharshee; so that by thus adding to the number of my household, the seventh death might perchance fall upon a slave, and not upon myself."

"Destiny is not to be defeated by a dodge," exclaimed Murad, "but still, the dream may not be literally fulfilled. You may yet escape. You may have, indeed, mistaken the number; seven, for six. Remember, O Selim! it once pleased Allah to try Eyoub. The blow that has fallen upon you is heavy. But you are yet alive, God is all-powerful. Like Eyoub you may flourish again. Shadbash, cheer up!"

"I expect nothing but speedy death," replied Selim; "I have locked up my house, and strolling down to the bazaar, thro' the force of habit, I find myself here, I know not how or why, for my heart is indeed contracted, and I have no desire to buy or sell."

Murad rejoined not, but allowed his friend to proceed undisturbed.

"I feel, that to buy a slave," resumed Selim, after a pause, "is wrong and cruel, and I yield not to the temptation."

"Are you quite alone in your house?" inquired Murad.

"I am," answered Selim; "and shall remain so, trusting in Allah, whether I am to live or expire. But if, O Murad, I am to die, I feel I may do so even this very night. And I know that beyond a day or two there is no escape for me."

"Bakkalonum!" ejaculated Murad. "We shall see. What is written, is written."

"Therefore, I conjure you, by Allah," continued Selim, "that you, and Aziz, and Atib, the little tailor, visit my house about the time of the first prayer to-morrow morning."

"To-morrow!" interrupted Murad, inquiringly.

"Yes, to-morrow," repeated Selim. "And the next morning, and the following morning also, if necessary. Rattle the door-ring once or twice, and, if I answer not, break your way in, that it may be discovered whether I be then alive or dead. If the latter, then, O Murad, you must see that I am properly washed and buried; for Oh, my friend, I am now alone—alone—alone. I have no household to perform the last offices."

Here, notwithstanding that resignation to the decree of Providence, for which the Osmanlees are, with justice, so celebrated, a few burning tears coursed down the cheeks of Selim. At this moment, Aziz, winding up a few hearty curses with the insulting word "Pezavenk," drove away the Arab from his mastabah, as one of his well-known customers, a portly Bin-bashee, or infantry colonel, was pompously approaching, apparently to make a purchase; and then Murad, after throwing a casual glance at the retreating, yawning son of Ishmael, spake the following words of comfort to Selim:

"I will not fail, O my friend, to render you the service you require, and I will take care that Atib and Aziz accompany me."

"Such service will ensure recompense in heaven!" said Selim.

"My duty to a fellow Muslim, and especially to one of my own cenaf, must not be neglected," replied Murad. "The reward is with Allah."

"I have bought my grave-clothes," continued Selim; "you will find them in a box in the wardrobe of the room in which I sleep."

Some further conversation occurred between the two friends, and then Selim rose and said, "I must now speak to Aziz, as the Bin-bashee has left him; and call also on Atib, the tailor. By the holy mantle of Mouhammad, Atib is the only man in the city to whom—even for a para—I am a bordjlu, a debtor."

"Then fortunate is your star," exclaimed Murad.

"I must pay Atib to-day," resumed Selim, "that no reflection may be cast on my memory. Atib is an honest man, and with him I shall also deposit my vasiet, my will, which, but for the blood-relationship between us, I should have confided to thee, O Murad."

And here, Selim, taking leave, fastened up his shop and departed. Murad remained in the bazaar, but, for this day, the Franks certainly deserved the bad character given to them by the one-eyed papoudjee. They bought no slippers.

A few hours passed away, and about sunset Selim attended prayers at an adjacent mosque, and then entered his now solitary abode in Turk Town. No cheering sound greeted his approach, the Khanum and her prattling children were now alike in the cold grave, and the poor Osmanlee's heart, though nearly bursting, still prompted him to bow, without repining, to the will of Allah Slowly he passed on to his chamber, where, taking a matrass from the cupboard or youk in which it was kept, he spread it on the floor, carefully placed thereon the necessary bed-clothes, and then sank down, not to sleep, but to meet his apparently inevitable fate.

The night wore on—the agitated mind of Selim instinctively surveyed his past life—the follies in the warm blood of inexperienced youth committed—the opportunities for charity even recently neglected—the hasty words of anger from time to time addressed to his slaves—the lukewarm zeal with which he had occasionally befriended the stranger—the now clearly-apparent selfishness that often unwittingly had actuated his motives—all, all passed before "the mind's eye" of Selim rapidly, distinctly, and forcibly; heart and head and memory seemed to acquire supernatural powers of recollection and many, therefore, were the prayers for pardon that now passed the lips of the self-accusing Mussulman.

And yet, Selim—compared with his fellows—was not a bad man. Let us proceed.

At midnight the young moon threw but a faint light upon the city, and indefinable shadows played along the walls of Selim's oda. The poor fellow had for hours momentarily expected his dissolution, that "sudden wrench from all we know." At last he happened to turn his eyes towards the door curtain, and near to this he fancied he perceived a tall figure, sternly regarding him! It was so. This horrid reality froze his very life blood.

In a few moments the figure glided nearer to the bed. Selim started up in an agony of terror. "WHO ART THOU?" were the only words he could utter, and a cold sweat burst forth on his brow

"Be silent!" slowly exclaimed a hollow voice. "I AM AZRAEL, THE ANGEL OF DEATH!"

"My destiny is then fulfilled!" murmured Selim, his knees knocking together, and his teeth chattering. Yes, in this dreadful moment the lessons of the Moullah did not depart from him. He religiously pronounced the Muslim profession of faith: "I testify there is no Deity but Allah; and that Mouhammad is God's Apostle. To God we belong, and to God we must return." Having made this profession, Selim sunk into a swoon.

On partially recovering his senses, and now feeling certain he was about to die, he hastily pulled the wadded quilt over his head, expecting every moment to be his last, and every echo of the wind to be the footstep of Azrael.

Some time elapsed, yet Selim still lived, though all his strength had long passed away. Why did Azrael hesitate to give the fatal blow? A thought struck Selim. Had the Angel of Death mercifully departed? But he removed not the quilt from his face, fearful to meet the gaze of the fell destroyer. Had Azrael passed on to the Hebrew mahallé, to slay a predestined number of heartless usurers? Had he altogether, or only for a while left Selim? And when would he return? Oh, the agony of suspense! the indescribable horror of that dread pause in the tide of life, when at its very height of glorious flood, the sparkling stream delays for a short space that fatal turn which marks the commencing ebb, the downward, slow but certain, ever-increasing current rushing to the Sea of Death! Selim swooned again. Is he dead?

The night passed away; the day dawned; the call to the first prayers resounded from the minarets; and——but who are these?

Several persons entered the apartment. They saw spread on the floor a bed, whereon appeared the form of a human body, motionless as a corpse, and covered with a quilt. The first was Murad, now come to redeem his promise made in the bazaar.

"The dream is indeed fulfilled," thought Murad to himself, "yet bakkalonum, yet let us see; we are early, 'tis scarcely day, it is possible life may not be extinct, and if I come but in time to close my poor friend's eyes, the Frankish fear of contagion shall find no imitator in Murad, the Papoudjee. Inshallah! Selim shall not be quite deserted in the hour of death!"

Atib, the little tailor, and Aziz now came forward, while Murad stooped down, and in a voice trembling with emotion, slowly uttered the simple word "Selim!"

"O Azrael! O thou Angel of Death!" cried a faint voice immediately from the bed, "at length thou art returned! I, Selim, a true and faithful Muslim, am thoroughly resigned to my fate. Keep me no longer in suspense, but do thine office quickly. O Azrael, Azrael, as my last words, I testify there is no Deity but Allah. And I testify that Mouhammad is God's Apostle."

"Azrael!" shouted Murad in astonishment, and jerking the quilt away from Selim's countenance, "Azrael!" Why should you address me as Azrael? What am I but Murad, your friend Murad, the one-eyed Papoudjee, thanks to that cursed remed; Mashallah! 'tis now daybreak, open your eyes, and look up, none are around you but friends."

"I thank you, O Murad," replied Selim, gradually recognising his friend's voice, "but by the Beard of the Prophet, AZRAEL HAS BEEN HERE THIS NIGHT."

"You have had but another dream," suggested Murad.

"No," replied Selim, now opening his eyes, "again let me acquaint you, Azrael has been here, Azrael has pronounced the dread summons, and I expect his immediate return."

Atib the little tailor, or terzy, here evinced considerable uneasiness, became fidgety, and threw a furtive glance at the door-curtain, as if expecting Azrael to make his appearance forthwith from behind it.

"Selim's brain is wandering," whispered Murad to Aziz, "if Azrael has been here, how could Selim be yet alive?"

The little tailor here returned to the bed, and moving his tongue with some difficulty, owing to the fearful dryness of his mouth, ventured to ask Selim (who had again opened his eyes, but still remained prostrate), "Who else had paid him a visit during the night, or who had attended upon him?"

"Kimse yuelmédi!" exclaimed Selim; "no one at all. And how could they, for the door of my house was fastened? I gave you permission to break in, as you doubtless have done, for if you rattled the door-ring, I heard you not."

"The door fastened!" exclaimed the little tailor; "'Break in!' why, we found the door open! We rattled no door ring."

"To Azrael," replied Selim, "doors, perhaps, are no obstruction. Bolts and bars are but flimsy cobwebs to the Angel of Death. The door may have opened at his approach."

"The Moullahs know more about that than I do," continued the persevering tailor; "but pray, then, as you say no one has been up here, who is the man we saw down in the court-yard just now? Is he a new Kapoudjee, a new doorkeeper?"

"I am alone in my house, I have no Kapoudjee," cried Selim; "but Azrael, at this early dawn, may have made himself visible to you as well as to me. O you good Muslims, I know of no man in the court; and if my door was unlatched when you entered, Azrael must himself have opened it when he this night visited me."

On hearing these words the little tailor rushed from the room.

But Selim, confident that the inevitable Azrael was about to return, resumed his prayers aloud, in which his two friends joined.

Suddenly they were startled by the return of the tailor. "By the Beard of the Prophet," exclaimed he, on rushing into the room; "the man I saw in the court, and thought to be your Kapoudjee, and asleep on the ground, when we passed in, is a corpse, a corpse!"

"A corpse!" echoed Murad and Aziz in a breath.

"Yes, a corpse," repeated the tailor; "and on turning him over, I found beneath his clothes several things, besides this money, this bag of beshliks, and this dead fellow ——"

"Dead! a corpse!" exclaimed the hitherto sinking and bewildered Selim. "A man dead in the court-yard!" cried he, springing upright in the bed.

"As dead as Solyman the Magnificent!" cried the sleazy little tailor, "As defunct as Hajji Bektash."

"Then God be praised!" shouted Selim, leaping into the middle of the floor. "God be praised that the fellow is dead, whoever he is, HE makes the seventh of my dream, and not I. Azrael has taken him, and not me."

But here an almost electric change came over Selim's countenance, and he, in a tremor, exclaimed: "Yet, Azrael did address me! How is this? Seven dead, and I alive. And the dream ——"

In another instant Selim rushed as rapidly down to the court-yard as the little tailor had done. His three friends followed him, and lo! at the strength and activity of a man but a few minutes before verging on dissolution. They found him gazing sternly at the corpse.

"The Pezavenk!" exclaimed Selim. "I can unriddle it all. This fellow is a thief; the bag of beshliks, these other monies are mine. He has, this night, been plundering my house."

"I know the Pezavenk's ugly countenance," exclaimed Aziz. "This is the very Arab who was dozing on my mastabah in the bazaar yesterday, when the Bin-bashee arrived."

"Ah!" added Murad; "and he must then have been feigning sleep, and thus overheard Selim relate his dream to me."

"And, worse than all," rejoined Selim; "This son of a dog, (may his father be burnt!) must have entered my chamber for plunder, and, seeing my state, have passed himself off as AZRAEL, THE ANGEL OF DEATH! What a brain I must have not to have discovered the trick."

"Well, at all events," cried the little tailor; "the dream is now out,—seven were to die, and seven are dead. Selim is now the eighth in the house, and Inshallah, he will be saved."

And Selim was saved, and for aught we know to the contrary, yet occupies a shop in the slipper-bazaar at Smyrna.

THE MULE AND ITS PARENT.

LAST evening, at the conversazione of the Pumpford Literary and Scientific Institution, Dr. Podder delivered an interesting lecture "On a Remarkable Specimen of a Hybrid Bird, discovered in a State of Nature." The learned naturalist prefaced his description of this curious little creature by a few general observations on the subject of hybrids in ornithology. He said, his hearers were, of course, aware that the production of hybrids, or mules, among domesticated birds, was a familiar fact. All of them had often enough seen the mixed breed,—what, in sporting phraseology, he believed was called the cross,—between the primrose-tinted warbler of the drawing-room and our British goldfinch. But, frequent as was the occurrence of intermediate forms in a state of confinement, it was one of the utmost rarity under the condition of freedom. It would seem, if he might be allowed to say so, that captivity had the effect of softening the hearts of the prisoners, and of removing those antipathies that were the obstacles to conjugal union. It was to be expected that, ceteris paribus, a bird would, if possible, select a mate of its own species, exactly as, with any freedom of choice, a European, generally speaking, would not prefer to enter into a matrimonial alliance with a negress. They were told that every "Jack had his Jill," a principle which, if sound, implied that, necessarily, there was an exact proportion between the softer and sterner sex of the feathered race, making due allowance, of course, for those tribes which practised polygamy. But this was a point on which it was difficult to form a decided conclusion. Unfortunately, no means existed of obtaining from the winged population those statistical returns on which alone any satisfactory induction could be founded. And when it was considered how many interferences with the natural relations between the opposite sexes, of the parus, or tom-tit, for instance, and the common house sparrow, must be occasioned by the brick-trap and the pebble of the school-boy, and the artillery of the juvenile sportsman,—it was difficult to imagine that, in any given year, there would not be a surplus either of males or females, in each branch of the feathered family.

Now, of course, so very incongruous a union as that between a hawk and a partridge could hardly be anticipated. The raptorial partner in such a conjunction, were it temporarily effected, would soon devour the creature it was bound to cherish. But when there was a general agreement on the subject of diet, and other matters of taste and family arrangement, and no great disparity in dimensions and structure, he did not see why the odd male of one species should not, rather than exist in a state of melancholy celibacy, (for he would say that the state of celibacy was melancholy,) pair with the lone female of another. If he were a goose —which, he hoped, was not the case,—he should have no objection to a swan, however his hand—he should have said his wing—might be scorned by the bird of loftier lineage. He did not see why a blackbird, unable to find a helpmate of his own hue, should turn up his nose—that was to say, his beak—at a pretty thrush, with elegant plumage and a good voice; they were both musical, and entertained the same views on the subject of hawberries, cherries, earthworms, and snails. He could quite understand why a kingfisher and a nut-thatch could never agree, there would be perpetual bickerings between them with respect to dinner,—controversies such as sometimes occur between other couples; but why, where every sympathy, on this and every other important point prevailed, the mere difference of tribe should be so nearly an insuperable bar to union, he could not conceive. Such, however, was the fact; and chaffinch and greenfinch, siskin and linnet, stood aloof like Guelph and Ghibelline, or Capulet and Montague. Yet sometimes, though once in the course of ages, a plumed Romeo would, abandoning the traditions of his paternal house—or nest—seek the pinion of an equally exceptional Juliet. And more happy than the lovers whose sad story was commemorated by the Swan as an ornithologist, he delighted in applying the title—the Swan of Avon,—the nuptials of the eccentric pair were blessed with offspring, by which, in fact, alone, the circumstance of the marriage was revealed. The parents lived again, both of them, in their progeny, which combined, in its own person, the plumage and physiognomy of each.

An exemplification of this rare fact they witnessed in the specimen before him, for the admirable mounting of which he had employed an eminent taxidermist. He would presently send round this most interesting curiosity, and those present could then have an opportunity of forming their own opinions as to its origin, of which the precise nature seemed dubious. Some regarded it as a breed between the Fringilla viridis, or greenfinch, and the Motacilla flava or yellow wagtail: but such a combination as that of a seed-eating grosbeak, with an individual of the insectivorous, thin-billed oscines, was an impossible anomaly. For his own part, guided by careful reference to plumage, and by consideration of probability in supposing affinities, he concluded that the bird had derived its parentage from an alliance of the common bunting with the yellow-hammer. The length of the individual was about five inches: the head was surmounted with a brownish tuft; the wing coverts and tertials were marked with the same colour; the neck, breast, belly, sides, and flanks were of a yellowish green; the under tail coverts whitish; beak and legs of a whitish flesh colour; eyes black. His opinion as to its origin was deduced partly from considering the peculiarities of its tertials and primaries,—partly from a careful admeasurement of the length of the carpal-joint to the end of the wing. It was not, he trusted, with undue pride, that he contemplated the mighty advance of science, which had enabled a Cuvier to construct an entire animal of the pre-Adamite world from the fragment of a bone, and by the aid of which he himself had, in like manner, as he conceived, demonstrated the pedigree of this little unknown. Knowledge was power, and, together with the steam-engine and the electric telegraph, the science of ornithology, pursued in a philosophical spirit, would alter the destinies of the world. The learned lecturer concluded amid great applause by handing round the bird for inspection, observing that he was indebted for its acquisition to a lad, who had knocked it down with a stone on Clapham Common.

The wonder of ornithology had scarcely gone a quarter round the company, when a lady, uttering a scream, suddenly let it drop on the floor. Immediately several persons ran to her assistance, under the impression that she had been taken ill; but declining their proffered aid, she stated that her feelings had been overcome by the sight of the supposed hybrid, which turned out to be no other than a lost favourite, sought in vain, by the following advertisement, in the "Times" of Dec. 30:—

FLOWN AWAY, from ——, Cheapside, a TAME CANARY-BIRD.

This unexpected circumstance appeared slightly to confound Dr. Podder, who declared he certainly had felt perfectly confident that the bird in question was a mule.

An old gentleman present remarked that he had always understood that the notion of a mule involves the idea of a donkey.

The scientific discussion then terminated, and that of tea and coffee concluded the proceedings.

A FEW WORDS ABOUT MEDIÆVAL MONSTERS.

ON "COLLEGE MONSTERS."

As there is no doubt that terrifying people a little is sometimes good for them, we have often admired the singular success which our mediæval architects, sculptors, artists, emblazoners, and monumental brass manufacturers attained in this respect. Instead of roasting, frying, or broiling a heretic by a slow fire; instead of burning him to charcoal by a quick one, they took things quietly; and when a heretic said he didn't believe something which he ought, or did believe something that he didn't ought, they simply set a watersprout to grin at him, or told a monumental brass to stare at him till he went home, had a fit of nightmare, went to his confessor at half-past six in the morning, and faithfully promised never again to believe or disbelieve anything without his permission.

Such, we suppose, was the charitable intention that led to decorating our churches with griffins, dragons, sea-horses, ghoules, gnomes, Pucks, fiends, and other semi-fabulous monsters. But if so, the intention failed most lamentably. If pulling horses' mouths would have kept a people religious; if sardonic-looking water-spouts would have regulated their consciences, and prevented their eating beef when parched peas were in season, there would have been no occasion for the burnings in Smithfield; and a few wry faces, by way of gentle remonstrance, would have saved not a few wry necks in the pillory, and not a few wry legs, arms, and faces, on the rack.

What, then, can have been their use? Were they intended to entertain people; and, in the hope of finding something equally funny inside, to induce them to enter church? Not long ago, passing one of Mr. Pugin's neatest, newest, and most mediæval churches, we heard one street-boy tell another to "look at them Guys up there"—an irreverent observation, which his mate made worse, by expressing a wish to "have a shy" at the said Guys. From the appearance of some of the "Guys" in question, outside our old churches, the custom of "taking shies" appears to be of ancient date.

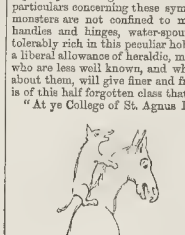
The great Durandus says that the ghastly, grinning, cholera-wincing images which people the outsides of churches, are intended to represent the evil spirits driven by the force of prayer from the inside to the outside. This is a beautiful idea: but if the "histrionics" (we don't mean the Amateur Club who performed Not so Bad as we Seem, for a good purpose, but the genuflexionists and mummerists) persist in driving away the people who want to pray in a simple and unaffected manner; if they persist in reviving the twaddle, and furbishing the rubbish of middle aged superstition, we shall expect to find the water-spouts, with all the griffins, dragons, devils, horses' mouths, sea-horses, and monsters in general, again taking shelter inside, and staring and grinning us out of our own pew.

No; this cannot have been the use. If it had been, people would always go to the churches where the water-spouts and gurgoyles are most terrific, and would cut the nasty brick buildings, where there isn't a horrid face to be seen. But people do not. These bogie-looking visages have lost their power; matter-of-fact people only believe that water-spouts are intended to carry off the rain and prevent it coming through the roof; and people of taste only think that the gurgoyles might as well be ornamented in a different manner.

Is it possible that these grim figures represent people driven mad by the insincerity and want of charity of those within the Church? Are they the ghosts of people who lived bad lives, and when they could no longer enjoy their money, left it to build churches? Did the trustees who got the money, put up these grim images as characteristic of the lives the donors had led? Did they think that those who had made their money and gained their worldly ends without much regard to the means, and who had died with their consciences in a sadly dirty condition, might as well have become instrumental to a little cleanliness after their death? Alas! who knows whether many a water-spout could not tell a sad story of some knight, baron, or esquire, perhaps of some saint, whose virtues, strange to say, were never found out till after his death?

It is of no use to attempt conjectures upon these matters, especially as imagination furnishes much more entertaining particulars concerning these symbols than any history. But the monsters are not confined to mere purposes of utility. Door-handles and hinges, water-spouts, brackets, and knockers, are tolerably rich in this peculiar hobgoblin mythology; but there is a liberal allowance of heraldic, monastic, and scholastic monsters, who are less well known, and who, as we literally know nothing about them, will give finer and freer play to the imagination. It is of this half forgotten class that we would briefly treat.

"At ye College of St. Agnus Dei de Bonaventura Bullferrie," saith an ancient chronicle,* "there bee certaine yryte goods ynd usefulle, yet cunning devices, by ye wyche is yryte well sett forthe ye duties of ye fellowes, clerkis, and others of ye samen house, ye one to ye tother." Proceeding upon this information, when we were last at Bullferry, we made an inquiry into the existence of these "devices," and were much pleased at finding that they could not only be seen, but seen for nothing—a rare circumstance in the collegiate city of Bullferry.



This legend sheweth how ye Fellow of y College should train and demean himself towards ye younger members of that Society.

We cannot give many particulars of these interesting monsters; but a few of them will speak for themselves. We were especially struck with a pathetic symbol, inculcating, as we are told, "how ye fellow of ye college should train and demean himself towards ye younger members of that society." It represented a river-horse, with an elaborate tail, and of a generally grotesque appearance, affectionately supporting a young, and—metaphorically speaking—unfledged river-horse upon its shoulders. Thereupon we fell a wondering how it was that the College of St. Agnus Dei de Bonaventura had so few undergraduates; and that, except those that were hereafter themselves to be fellows, youth were so little cared for in the said college. And we did wonder why the poor bible clerks and chaplains did get so little, and the large river-horses—we mean the senior fellows—so much. And then we thought it would be well if all the fellows of that same college had shoulders as broad as the river-horse, for they have enough blame to bear for their neglect and laziness.

With our natural love of the antique, and our fixed determination literally to leave no stones unturned that were likely to turn up anything like useful information, we resolved to cull a few more golden maxims and lessons from the elaborate and semi-intelligible monsters surrounding the purlieus of St. Agnus Dei de Bonaventura College, Bullferry.

Passing under the windows of the Very Reverend the Warden's lodgings, our eyes rested upon a lion, slightly fantastic in anatomy and in attitude—but still a lion. His claws were evidently ready for action; but whether prompted by a desire of his dinner, or for vengeance upon a foe, was less evident. His mane was singularly orderly and respectable, and apparently trimmed by the Figaro who daily attends the Nineveh sculptures in the British Museum, it being arranged in a compact series of small and regular curls peculiar to mediæval lions, and seldom witnessed at menageries. Even his tail had been made subservient to ornamental detail, being neatly twisted into a band, and curled round his body. His claws were also rather like those of a weathercock dragon, and his ears were of an ornamental rather than a zoological pattern. All our conventional notions as to the position of the lion while couchant for his prey, or while lashing his tail in "making up" for a roar, vanished at once, and we felt that, if there was faith in sculpture, the lion had been lamentably misrepresented at the Zoological Gardens.

Our friend Oakes, of Tipton College, Bullferry, did direct our attention to the legend of the said lion; and we tried to rub away the dust from our eyes and our Latin; and we read—

FORTITUDO
VIGILANTIA:

Which two substantives, standing alone without copulative conjunction, do nevertheless signify that the fellows, warden, and other collegiate officiates ought to unite valour with watchfulness, and ought to be alert to discover, and valiant to repel, any foe to the prosperity, learning, and goodliness of the College of St. Agnus Dei de Bonaventura.

Then did we begin to ponder what was the watchfulness shown by the said warden and fellows. Did it appertain unto the "ryte and newe methode of brewerie, settynge forth howe yt ye beere did oughte to be brewed 3 times over, ye wych is called FROOFE; for yt it proveth a man hys capacitie for drynkinge."* Surely not; for "albeit beer doth make men valiant, it little helpeth cautiousness," saith Erasmus Barcliensis. Can it be the keeping of the College money? No. Did not the founder, Sir Guy Sherrywine, leave his money for the support of poor scholars? But if the fellows keep the money—and friend Oakes (who is a clerk only, and therefore hath reason to know) says they do keep it—verily the lion doth misrepresent the will of the founder, and hath only the watchfulness of the dragon—over dead men's treasure.

And for his bravery, we know not whether it be much better. To be sure, Tom Swagson—who did'nt take a first class in literis humanioribus, after being stroke in the St. Agnus De Bonaventura eight—did pommel a policeman, and did get pommelled in a row with the "town," for that he had pinned a cracker to the hat of a "cad." Yet did his brother, for that he had been fellow, make him fellow, too, albeit he was obliged to give up smoking a clay pipe down Broad-street, in consequence. But Tom Swagson lived very happily on his fellowship, and didn't miss his fighting or his pipe.

But our friend Oakes, who knoweth everything, from the dissecting of grasshoppers up to the ornaments at the summit of the unfinished spire of Cologne Cathedral, did rebuke us for our ignorance, and did straightway put into our hands a tract, entitled, "Poor Scholars, or a Few Hints on University Extension, with a View to the more perfect carrying out of Founders' Intentions according to their spirit."

We went home, and we began to read; and quickly did we see what the valour, boldness, or courage of the warden and fellows must be. When we had read it, we thought that a lion of brass would have conveyed the lesson even more forcibly than a lion of stone.

From the aforesaid pamphlet it did appear that Sir Guy Sherrywine had left certain monies to found certain fellowships, scholarships, clerkships, and other offices dedicated to the advancement of sound and useful learning. In process of time, land brought more money, and the fellows and other heads got more; but the clerks got less. It did further appear, that whilst other smaller and poorer colleges admitted plenty of commoners, and gave them a fair chance of getting anything they had ability to deserve, the fellows of St. Agnus Dei did manfully resist all such intrusions, and did give away all the good things to their own relations and private acquaintances, and did throw open the clerkships, which were worth nothing, to public competition.

We were right. The St. Agnus Dei lion was no lion at all. Perhaps the angry ghost of the founder appeared to him one night, after the fellows had gone to bed, oppressed with the "gaudy day" dinner, and frightened all his nobler features into a mediæval burlesque.

Three cheers, then, for the brave fellows of St. Agnus Dei de Bonaventura; and three small ones for their brothers, sons, nephews, and cousins, who will be fellows in their turn. May they never want covetousness to deserve rebuke, nor intrepidity to turn a deaf ear to it!

Our dearly beloved young friend, Araminta Motacilla Fitz-Dugdale, who loveth everything mediæval, and who, despite the drawing-lessons she hath received from Dilk Compass, Esq., R.A., doth still incline to represent the background in the foreground, with divers other such whimsicalities. Araminta, we say—she of the lovely locks over the lovely shoulders—did ask me the other day why there were no dear, lovely monsters in the Middle Ages, as well as frightful ones? Hereupon we went home, and did painfully ponder upon this question. What did Araminta mean by a "dear, lovely monster?" Could it be something like her cousin, Reginald Fitz-Dragon, in the Guards, with whom the Toilet-Table Post did say there was something on the tapis? Surely not; for the said Reginald was a love of a waltzer, and never swore, except at a Blackwall tête-à-tête dinner, with Herr Von Stoppyswix. We thought, and we reflected, and we pondered, and we turned to books of reference, and we looked out of the window, and we wrote our name on the blotting paper, and we poked the fire, and we looked at the ceiling; but nothing would do. We were in despair. Suddenly our door opened, and friend Oakes appeared.

Of course we confided our difficulties to our pantological friend. Seizing a pen, he hastily sketched a curious thing, looking like a duck's neck taken out of a gilbet-pie, and placed in the middle of the Egyptian wig in the British Museum. He at the same time informed us that it was the Pelican of the Wilderness plucking her own breast to feed her young; that it was a popular stone effigy among the monsters of St. Agnus Dei de Bonaventura; but that, through long neglect, the wig—that is to say, the ivy—had grown over it, till nothing but its neck and one foot remained visible.

With the neatest steel pen, on the most spotless paper, and in the neatest envelope, did we embody this "dear, lovely" monster of the Middle Ages; with our crest did we seal it, and by our friend's scout did we despatch it. Then we fell a-musing again. What had pelicans to do with colleges? In the plenitude of our innocence, we asked Oakes "whether they were good to eat?"

I wish you had seen Oakes (who is sternly scientific), when I asked him that question. Laying down his carefully-coloured German-silver-mounted "cutty," he looked at us, till we felt shrivelled into our boots and our insignificance, at the same time. But he soon began the instructive

"Pelicans are not good to eat—at least, I never heard that they were; neither do Pelicans feed their young with their own blood, but I have heard that they do."

"Why, then, their emblematical application?"

"Because they were supposed to do so, exactly as, when colleges were founded, it was supposed that wardens and fellows would be capable and willing to do their duty. You might as well infer the one as the other. But," added Oakes, looking at his watch, "I have to meet the Society for the Diffusion of Skeletons and Subjects, and it only wants a quarter to four." With that he left us.

We felt sad at heart. Was there nothing pretty left among the memorials of the Middle Ages? Was everything left for one purpose swallowed up for another? Had human heart's blood as little existence in the University, as pelican's blood in the ingredients of animal sustentation? Were the veins and arteries of collegiate authorities as shrivelled as the corses of those whose wealth they were enjoying? Were those, whose duty it was to feed the young with the food of life, to animate them by example, and to incite them to rivalry by their own greatness were they conventional heroes of a fable, like the pelican? Was the food they gave, like hers, aprocryphal; and was the ivy that covered the pelican but the sad emblem of the sordid apathy that had rotted the very entrails of St. Agnus Dei de Bonaventura, fed upon the "rich mould of dead men's graves," and grown splendid in its forgetfulness of the living?

THE SQUANDERS OF SQUANDER CASTLE.*

CHAPTER III.—MASTER TOM—MY PUPILS—JEMMY M'SCUTT'S VERY ORIGINAL SOURCE OF INCOME.

On finding myself, by such a prosperous gale of good fortune, a resident in the wealthy family of the Squanders, and in so respectable a capacity, I began to observe more closely the economy of the house, and the individual character of its inmates. Of the Squire himself, the reader has already had some intimation. He was one of those good-natured men, whose good-nature consists only in easiness of temper, and a strong habit of self-indulgence, without possessing scarcely a single practical virtue capable of making him a useful or respectable member of society. He was not then a harsh landlord, nor a man who would willingly harass or oppress his tenantry; but he was both negligent and ignorant of his duties as a landlord-proprietor. Indeed, so much so, that he was perfectly unconscious that "Property had its duties as well as its rights." He simply imagined that his tenantry were bound to pay him his rents, and that it was his business only to receive them. But as to the various acts of justice, encouragement, instruction, or forbearance, and a hundred other points involved in the duties of a landlord, he never once dreamt of them. These matters were altogether excluded from the habits and practice of the class to which he belonged, and, in his ignorance and neglect of them, he was in no degree singular. To look into the state and circumstances of his property—to observe modes of cultivation—to make himself acquainted with the habits and character of his tenantry, or the nature of the soil, never for a moment came within the spirit of his creed. The system by which he acted was that which predominated, almost without exception, among the landlords of Ireland. It is true he would have fought a duel for one of his tenantry, if he imagined, for instance, that he had received "unfavourable law" from a neighbouring magistrate; but he would not scruple to horsewhip the same tenant on the following day. In fact, he has been known to fight for one of them. On a certain occasion, a farmer of his was summoned before a justice of peace, who lived only a few miles from him, and who was, besides, landlord to the plaintiff. The worthy magistrate having decided in favour of his own tenant, was waited upon next day by Mr. Squander, to whom, as his legitimate protector, the defeated man complained. Squander immediately took fire, paid a visit to the justice, horsewhipped him soundly, and, the next morning, after an exchange of three shots, put a bullet into his hip, which lamed him for life. Hunting, shooting, steeple chasing, wagering, and convivial debauchery, were the habits of his life. It is true, every Christmas and Easter he whistled the Hundredth Psalm, for he said that no man ought to pass through life without letting his family and dependants see that he was not insensible to religion. Poor Dr. M'Claret fell an easy victim to his profuse and impetuous hospitality. On being appointed by Trinity College to the rich living of that parish, he undertook, from the best and purest motives, to work some benefical change in the licentious habits of the Squire, a task for which his gentleness and flexibility of character badly qualified him. Instead of reforming Mr. Squander, the latter seduced him into a love of claret, and, ultimately, into the character of an amiable, harmless, but confirmed sot. He also boasted of his intrigues and seductions in presence of his sons, and would conclude by asking them, "Ha! you young dogs, when will any of you ever follow me that?"

"Wait father," Master Dick would say; "give us time—and never fear but I, for one, will prove myself a chip of the old block." A reply which highly delighted his worthy parent.

Mrs. Squander was the daughter of Lord Mount Gallivant, a rakish nobleman—well known in Ireland—whose character for gallantry was such that no parent anxious for the morals and reputation of his daughters would admit him into his family. Unfortunately, she was proud in matters of small importance, and extravagant in her habits of life, though shamefully negligent of her duties as the mistress of a large and expensive establishment. She was actuated by a ridiculous feeling, that any kind of attention to the affairs of her household was beneath a lady of her high birth, whose husband paid a large retinue of servants for the express purpose of managing them. She brought him no fortune; for the jolly Squire, who was influenced by a ludicrous ambition to become connected with an aristocratic family, had married her from that principle; and, indeed, it was to her pride and extravagance that may be traced, in the first instance, that senseless profusion which ultimately ruined him. His establishment, when he brought her home to preside over it, was, God knows, extravagant enough, and such as was far more than sufficient to sustain his position as a country-gentleman. Even this, however, was not to her taste. She must make him feel, and let the world know, that his wife ought to hold such a distinguished position as became her high birth. The establishment was consequently re-modelled and amplified to such a standard that, ere the expiration of twelve months, the worthy Squire found himself living at a rate of nearly double his former expenditure, and considerably beyond his income. In appearance Mrs. Squander was tall, very fair-haired, with good eyes, and rather large mouth Every day in the week, whether they entertained company or not, she went, with due punctuality, through all the ceremonies of the toilet. Indeed, so exact was she in this respect, that she caused every one of her children, before they had reached the age of six years, to be formally dressed for dinner; and it was not until her sons grew too big, and, I may add, too dissolute to regard this ceremony, that they were allowed to leave it off, and run into the opposite extreme—which they did.

The Squire had a brother in the house, whom I cannot overlook in this description of his family. He was a quiet man, who came down to breakfast and dinner every day in the week without uttering a single word or syllable—unless, indeed, very rarely. The great pleasure of his life was smoking; and, next to that, to take a glass of punch with some of the tenants. The poor, inoffensive man was, besides, all benevolence, and, if he ever did speak, it was always in defiance of the absent, of some servant with whom his sister-in-law might have found fault, or of a negligent or needy tenant whom his brother might be abusing. Never, however, was the pipe out of his mouth, unless when asleep or at meals. He was in possession of a small income—about three hundred a year—and the good which he clandestinely effected by it might well serve as an example to those who possess larger and more comprehensive means of serving their fellow-creatures. After breakfast he went up silently to his room—smoking; after dinner, he repeated his visit to the same place—still smoking; sometimes he would go out to the labourers while at work; sometimes to sit in a tenant's house—still smoke—smoke—smoking. Upon the latter occasion, he usually put a flask of whiskey, with a suitable quantity of lump-sugar, into his pocket; and, after a quiet chat, he would pull it out, and, having got the kettle boiled, would mix it with his own hands, and treat the family, taking a glass at the same time himself. He never looked into a newspaper, nor a book; nor was he ever supposed to bestow attention upon any subject that was calculated to awaken his mind from its languid and torpid state. Such, we say, he appeared and was supposed to be. Under this simplicity, however, there existed not merely a capacity for deep feeling, but keen, quiet powers of observation, of which neither the world nor his own friends had the least suspicion.

He was known as Master Tom: for, in Ireland, younger brothers, if unmarried, are frequently so denominated, by the peasantry, to the last day of their lives. Nothing could exceed his popularity in the neighbourhood, nor the love which was borne him by every inmate of his brother's house. Even Mrs. Squander, with all her pride and haughtiness, liked him; for, whenever she and her husband happened to discuss the relative merits of their families, he uniformly took her part. Emily doated on him, because she was more in his secrets than any of the rest, and was better acquainted with the simplicity and truth of his affections, and his furtive benevolence.

Master Tom was the youngest of the family, and, in consequence of the utter indifference to moral or literary training which prevailed at that period among the class to which his father belonged, we need scarcely say that his education had been shamefully neglected. He was, at the time I write of, within forty; a young looking man, with good features—of a florid, placid, and benevolent expression. Such was Master Tom, of whom the reader will hear more before the conclusion of our narrative

The furniture of the castle had been rich and fashionable, and might be still pronounced so; but the convivial habits of the Squire, the carelessness of the servants, and the orgies which took place there so frequently, had, in the course of time, impressed upon every thing in the house a rakish, and, if we may be permitted to apply the term, a licentious character. The beautiful tables were dinged and stained; the sofas, although well-looking to the eye, felt crazy when you sat upon them. The carpets bore similar marks of intemperance; and there was scarcely a sober chair in the dining-room.

Having thus given a slight sketch of the family, I shall now proceed to detail the history of the progress which my pupils made under my management.

In order to my greater success, I drew up a set of rules for their adoption. In this programme I appointed the hours for study, and for their attendance in the school-room. I then examined them or, rather, attempted to do so—in order to ascertain the extent of the acquirements already made, that I might know from what point to start. The school-room in which this experiment took place was a large, comfortable apartment, with a bagatelle-table in one end, on which lay a large backgammon-box, closed. On looking into this, I discovered two or three packs of cards; and, on examining the other appurtenances of this precious seminary, I observed several fowling-pieces, powder-flasks, shot-belts, wash ram-rods; together with landing-nets, fishing-rods, stuffed-birds, hunting-horns, and—though last, not least—no less than three cases of duelling pistols; one for each pupil—purchased for them by their affectionate father.

It is due to myself to confess here, that I approached my task with two distinct impressions. In the first place, I felt anxious, not only to do my duty, but to do it in such a manner as might produce beneficial results to my wild and headlong pupils; and, in the next, I was fully conscious of the almost insuperable difficulties that lay in my way. The eldest, Master Dick, was a good-looking stout boy, in or about seventeen. He was hasty, rather selfish, but not ill-natured, muscular, active, and remarkably well-made. Even at that age, however, there were visible, as well in his features as in his whole manner and bearing, the traces of early dissipation and a reckless life, as well as of a heart untamed and already corrupted by the premature propensities of unrestrained passion and indulgence. He was his father's favourite, and he knew it. From his birth, until the moment he came under my charge, a moral check, or a religious restraint had never been placed upon him. In every whim, and caprice, and desire, he had been allowed his own way, and the consequence was, that this system of indulgence added such force to the impetuous impulse of his will and passions, that any attempt even to moderate them was resented with a burst of indignation and rage that, in one so young, was frightful. The truth was, that not only his father, but his mother, sister, the servants, labourers, and tenants, all dreaded him, and made a point never to come in his way, or, at least, with one exception, to leave it as soon as possible whilst these furious outbursts of temper were upon him. When in this state he used to cuff and kick the unfortunate servants and dependents as if they were mere dogs, whilst they, poor devils, were obliged to put up with his violence and bear his outrages with patience, under the alternative of being dismissed without a character. It is true, that, as soon as his good temper returned, he would certainly apologise, tell them he was sorry, that he did it in a passion, and, having said as much, would throw them a handful of loose silver, by way of compensation.

In the last sentence but one, we mentioned an exception. This was the cunning old huntsman, Jemmy M'Scutt, who always made it a point to throw himself in his way in the most outrageous moments of his passion, certain, at the time, that he was to come in for a thrashing; but as the hardened, weather-beaten old sinner was impenetrable to blows, his policy was to secure the compensation which he knew would follow. I have reason to believe that the shrewd old knave did not derive less than a pound a week from this extraordinary source of income.

The next was Master Harry, who, in point of disposition and character bore a considerable resemblance to his brother. He had, however, a greater command over his temper, and a much greater power of concealing what he felt. His resentments, too, were deeper, though less obvious, and, to a close observer, it was evident, that, though calmer than the other, he was much more implacable and vindictive, and retained his resentments until gratified by the infliction of some secret act of vengeance. His manner, though much more plausible, was also darker and more sullen than that of Dick. The latter, notwithstanding his wild, but transient, ebullitions of temper, was rather popular, and even well liked; whilst Harry, notwithstanding his greater habit of self command, was no favourite at home and decidedly unpopular abroad.

The third, and youngest, was James. And here I cannot help dwelling upon a fact, connected with domestic character, which almost every person must have observed. Whether the members of a family be sons or daughters, or both, it is an indisputable truth that there will be always found one individual among them beyond comparison more kind, more amiable, more truthful, more virtuous, and, in general, by far more gifted than the rest. Young James was, indeed, an appropriate proof of this. Though injured considerably by the example of his brothers, by moral and religious neglect, and the ill-treatment he had to endure, yet was the moral of his character essentially amiable, generous, and good. Seldom have I seen a young lad surrounded by such disadvantages, so extremely candid and unselfish. He scorned falsehood, abhorred hypocrisy, and never, under any circumstances, or through any temptation, could be induced to lend himself to deceit or fraud. His susceptibility of sympathy and compassion was in keeping with the generosity of his disposition; and, whilst his manners were mild and unassuming, his character was one of singular firmness, courage, and resolution. By his brothers he was looked upon with something approaching to contempt, and the usual term by which his father recognised him was "the Ninny."

"Poor James will never be good for anything," he would say. "He will grow up a ninny, like his Uncle Tom."

This was one of the few observations which usually made Tom speak. On such occasions he would look his brother in the face, take the eternal pipe out of his mouth, and turning the thumb of his left hand over his shoulder, ask, pointing to the two eldest, "And what will they be good for, brother?"

It is not my intention here to enter into any details of the difficulties and struggles which I had to encounter in attempting to educate the two eldest of these blessed youths. It is enough to say that whatever good I accomplished, and it was not much, was by a system of compromise. In the course of a short time I became necessary, nay, indispensable to them; for, in consequence of the lives they had led from their infancy up, and the criminal indulgence they had received at the hands of their parents, they were utterly deficient in the virtue of self-reliance. They could pursue no sport or diversion without me. When out with the fox-hounds, I always if I were not there to witness their feats and to direct them, the sport was dull. Without me the steeple-chase was insipid. It was the same thing with grouse, partridge, or snipe-shooting; and, in whipping the streams, none but Randy could tie their flies to any purpose. I, however, made my bargain; unless they got, satisfactorily, through a certain portion of school-work, I denied them my society in all their sports. By this means I continued to advance them by degrees, until, having mastered their early difficulties, the labour began to get lighter and less repulsive. Such was my system, and, indeed, it was the only one by which either I or any individual living could win them even into reluctant and desultory habits of application. With James I had comparatively little trouble, because his natural talents were good, and his attention indefatigable.

During the first six months I was in the family, I could observe that although the Squire lived at the same profuse and reckless rate, yet he was frequently subject to occasional fits of the deepest gloom and depression. Sometime before this time, my stepfather, in consequence of the reformation of his conduct towards my brother and sisters, was promoted to the office of bailiff, which my father had filled. The fellow, aware that I resided in his landlord's house, and conscious that any further violence to his stepchildren must reach me through my sister, and that from me it would assuredly pass to the landlord himself and his sons, deemed it more prudent to change his tone, and assume the hypocrite. Why this man, who I had reason to believe was no favourite with either the Squire himself or any of his family, should have got such an appointment, was, at that time, a secret to me, and perplexed me very much as to the cause of it. It is true, I was then young and unreflecting, but I came to the knowledge of it afterwards. It was a stretch of policy on the part of Master Dick with regard to my sister, and I have no doubt but a similar motive was at the bottom of my own engagement

I could observe now that the Squire felt great reluctance in sending to the Post-office for his letters; and that when the lad who was in the habit of going for them had returned, and placed them on the breakfast-table—for, owing to the influence of my worthy pupils, I was now allowed to breakfast and dine with the family, unless when they had company—he took them up one by one, and, throwing some of them aside with a peevish air, opened and read such only as he thought were not disagreeable. These unpleasant missives continued to increase both in number and frequency until, at length, he exclaimed, as if forgetting himself, "Confound me, but I shall soon be a prisoner in my own house!" An expression which startled me very much; but seemed to have no effect whatsoever upon either Dick or Harry.

CHAPTER IV.

A GAUGER OUTWITTED—JAMES SQUANDER'S DEPARTURE FOR COLLEGE

I HAVE already mentioned the huntsman, Jemmy M'Scutt, as a dry, cunning old knave; and I must add, here, that there was a sinister expression in his small, keen eye, which could not be mistaken. If any man possessed an extraordinary fertility of invention in everything requiring iniquity and fraud, Jemmy was that man. It was impossible to look at him for a moment without passing at once to the idea of deceit and treachery. There was a perpetual sneer, or what is termed, a white laugh, upon his hard features, which completely dissociated him from everything like candour and truth. He had, in fact, that obvious character of nature which at once tells you that it is utterly impossible even to guess at the process of the right or edification which is going on within him. Yet was he the most confidential servant in the whole establishment. The truth is, he was looked upon as an oddity, and enjoyed a license both of language and action that was permitted to no other domestic in the castle. Jemmy had acted for many years in the capacity of huntsman and trainer to the Squire, and, in the early part of his engagement, rode many of his master's most important races. From this task, however, he was removed, not because the Squire ever doubted his integrity, but because he was not considered lucky. Jemmy, however, imputed the want of luck to his master, and relinquished the office of jockey with great apparent alacrity; saying, that it would ruin the character of any jock to ride for a man that is always opposed by Fortune. Be this as it may, for several years before I became an inmate in this family, he master had been losing heavily on the turf; yet, such was his infatuation, that he always guided himself by Jemmy's advice, and clung to the sport with an energy that must have been prompted by some powerful feeling. What that feeling was will appear. There was, however, one individual in the family who did not relish a bone in Jemmy's body, and that was Master Tom. Whether this prejudice on the part of Master Tom resulted from the honest instinct of his truthful heart it is difficult to decide. One thing we knew to be equally clear on the part of Jemmy, which was that he entertained as strong a prejudice against Master Tom as the latter did against him; so that, as the proverb says, "there was no love lost between them."

I will here mention an exploit of Jemmy's, which, as the conception was original, and as it could occur nowhere but in Ireland, will satisfy the reader that I don't, in the least, overrate his invention. And while on this point I am bound to say, that, in any matter where straightforward honesty and that sagacious integrity which so eminently characterises the great body of commercial life in England, were necessary, there was not a greater blockhead in Europe than our redoubtable huntsman. In order to draw out his talents there must be fraud, over-reaching, and dishonesty. In other words the only morality with which he was imbued, or of which he had any notion, was the morality of the turf

The reader may remember that Master Dick told me, on the evening I went to pass my examination with the Doctor, that his father had three hogsheads of poteen whiskey at one end of the dining-room, to give them what he called, "a seasoning." Now it so happened that the gauger of the district—a mellow lad himself, and a frequent guest at the Squire's table—had, for good reasons, been removed to a different district, and a stranger put in his place. At all events, the Squire had a few friends—that is to say, about a score—to dine with him, whilst the three large casks aforesaid were still in the same position—exposed to the eye of every one who entered the room. As the party were seated at dinner, one of the servants made his appearance in a state of great alarm and agitation, exclaiming, "Thunder and turf, sir, what's to be done?—the new gauger and the military, your honour, are within two or three perches of the hall-door, and we'll be disgraced in the counthry for lettin' them bate us. Holy St. Countryman, what will we do—and three hogsheads of it there, lyin' before their eyes? What's to be done, sir?"

"Take your time, Lanty," said his master; "take your time; is Jemmy here?"

"He's within, sir, in the kitchen below."

"Send him up."

Jemmy, who had been helping himself to something good in the kitchen, entered the dining-room with his usual grave, but significant aspect; and, having gathered the palm of his hand, he wiped his thin, hard lips, which seemed a little greasy.

"Jemmy," said his master, "we're in a mess. There, as you know, are three hogsheads of poteen; and, on the other hand, this cursed new gauger, whom I don't know, assisted by a military officer and a strong guard of soldiers, are at the door. By my honour, there's their knock."

Jemmy looked at the whiskey, and then at the assembled dinner-party, with his usual sardonic grin; after which, he hitched up his old buckskins, and gave a short cough; which, from whatever cause, set most of them a laughing. In the meantime another knock was given, and his master desired him to be quick

"What's to be done, you old scoundrel?"

"Contrive, sir, to keep them to-night, or as long as you can, at all events," replied Jemmy, "and I will see what can be done."

In the mean time the gauger entered, and was shown into the front-parlour, where the Squire joined him. On entering, the gauger bowed; and, being politely asked his business—

"I am an Excise officer, sir," he replied; "and have replaced Mr. Bernard Fogarty, within the last few days. I am very sorry, sir, for giving you this trouble; but I act in consequence of information."

"Of course, sir," replied the Squire, "you are bound to do your duty."

"I have had secret intelligence given to me," proceeded the other, "that there are three hogsheads, or casks of illicit spirits in your dining-room."

"Pray step in, sir," replied the Squire, "and you shall see the three casks you speak of."

The other accordingly did so, and felt somewhat surprised at finding a large dinner-party seated at table; but, what was far more agreeable, the three large casks were there, exactly in accordance with his information

"You are aware, sir," he observed, "that my informant has been quite correct."

"So it seems," replied the Squire. "Gentlemen this is by the way, sir," he added, "I am not able to introduce you not having the pleasure of knowing your name."

"My name is Corbet sir," replied the other.

"This, gentlemen, is Mr. Corbet, who has been appointed to succeed Mr. Fogarty, the late very respectable Excise officer of this district."

Mr. Corbet bowed to the company; but very little notice was taken of a man who came not merely to disturb them at such an hour, but to deprive them of many a jolly beverage of the same excellent liquor.

"By the way, Mr. Corbet, you must dine with us," said the Squire; "your predecessor was a frequent guest of mine; and I trust that you will find the three casks before us no bar to my hospitality, or check upon good-will between us; but, I think that you said that you are accompanied by a military officer and a party of soldiers?"

"I am, sir," replied the Excise man; "but, as this kind of duty is not very palatable to the military in general, he declined to come in, until he should be called upon officially by me."

"Here, Mr. Corbet," said the Squire, "take a seat, you will have time enough to remove the casks; but, in the meantime, the gentleman must come in and join us; I shall have your horses put up and taken care of, and the men refreshed."

Accordingly the officer, a fine, dashing young fellow, joined them: and a very seasonable act of hospitality both he and the gauger found it, for the day was both cold and bitter in the extreme.

About forty, or even thirty years ago, it was an easy matter to get into an Irish gentleman's dining room, but not quite so easy to get out of it, especially in the west. It is customary to say here that a very agreeable evening passed, and that the gauger was forced, whether he would or not, to keep it up to the hour at which they went. In the course of the evening the huntsman sent word to his master that he wished to speak to him. On going to the hall, Jemmy addressed him: "Keep your guests, sir," said he, "until about two o'clock; and have as much uproar, and noise, and singing, as you can—leave the rest to me."

This was about ten o'clock, and the gauger, whose the Squire was out of the room, with a keen eye to business, went to the casks to ascertain that they were full and tried the taps; but the result he found not at all satisfactory. He was a little scoundrel, with a sour, dissatisfied, ill-tempered face, all the disagreeable points of which were brought out by liquor.

"All right, sir," he exclaimed, "all right and sound—I care about no Squire whatever Fogarty may have done. I'm a man that will always do my duty. I tell you, gentlemen, I am no greenhorn, but have my wits about me night and morning. I am not just the man to be done, gentlemen; although you pride yourselves here, in the west, for doing the gauger. However, let them do me that can, that's all I say; I have never been done yet, and I'll take good care that I never shall be. Any man that can, I will shake hands with him, and say he knows a thing or two, that's all. There they are," he added, pointing to the casks, "and I'll have them, that's the chat."

THE PARTY.

"Perfectly right, my friend," replied the Squire; "but, in the meantime, gentlemen, let us enjoy ourselves. I can only be fined. Well, I am able to pay the fine, that is one comfort; but come, let us stick to our liquor, and make a night of it. I suppose, Mr. Corbet, you won't disturb us by removing these casks to-night; it will be time enough in the morning."

"By Jasus," said the Coroner, "if he'd attempt to disturb the present company by removing them, I'd be betting on his beggarly carcase in less than a week, and make the jury bring in a verdict of 'Died by a righteous judgment.'"

"I care for no man," replied Corbet, peevishly. "I've sent for the carts to remove them, and if they come in time, it must and shall be done."

Here a dozen voices exclaimed. "Throw him out—throw the ungrateful scoundrel out; he is entitled to no forbearance."

"Gentlemen," said the Squire; "remember he is my guest, and that, by all the rules of hospitality I am bound to protect him. Don't be alarmed, Mr. Corbet," he added. "You shall experience no opposition in removing them."

The young officer felt indignant at the insolent conduct of the gauger. "I assure you, gentlemen," he observed, "there is no duty, to the discharge of which we are called, that presses upon us with such a sense of pain, and disgust, and degradation, as that which forces us to accompany a still-hound like this, upon such cursed expeditions. It is a disgrace to our service, and to an honourable profession, so to employ us. What a cursed regulation it is that compels me and my brave fellows to follow this fellow's beck."

"I shall report you, sir, for the use of these expressions," said the gauger.

"You be hanged," returned the officer. "You are ungrateful, sir, or you would'nt treat a gentleman with incivility and insolence, at whose hands you have received nothing but kindness and hospitality."

"Hospitality, sir," replied the other, "shall never bribe me from doing my duty."

The Squire again interfered, and peace was restored, but during this little tiff between the officer and the gauger, he contrived to let his friends know Jemmy's wish to wit, that they should make as much noise and uproar as possible. And so it was done, until the hour of two o'clock had arrived, at which time a knock came to the door, with an intimation to the gauger that the carts which he had sent for to carry off the spirits had just come, and were now ready.

"All right," he exclaimed. "Gentlemen, you must excuse me; duty is sacred. Lieutenant Bennet, I will trouble you to order in a party of your men to remove these casks. It is your duty, sir."

The gallant young fellow looked with a perplexed face at his entertainer, as much as to say, "You see, sir, I have no alternative." The Squire also felt perplexed, and was about to reply, when Jemmy entered, and with a grin of more than usual bitterness and triumph, said, "Gintlemen, the carts is come; I think, wid submission, it's better that these useless casks should be removed at once."

"Well now," thought his master, "what the devil can this old scoundrel be at? He surely would not be mad enough to raise the tenantry and attempt to rescue them, by which means many lives must be necessarily lost."

"I must go, sir," said the soldier rising; "but I protest to Heaven it is the most painful and disagreeable duty I was ever called on to perform."

He accordingly went out, and almost immediately returned with a dozen men into the room.

"Now, sir," said he, "there are the men for you, give them their orders."

"Here, men," said the gauger, bloated now with liquor and a consciousness of authority. "Remove these three casks,—one at a time, you will find them heavy."

The soldiers who, by the way, had been supplied with abundant refreshments in one of the outhouses, approached the casks, and, to their utter surprise, as well as to that of all present, found every one of them empty.

"These casks are all empty, sir," said the men; "there is nothing in them," and they rolled them about with their feet in order to satisfy him of the fact

"Your men are drunk, sir," said Corbet, addressing himself to their commander.

"Certainly not, sir," replied the other coolly. "I wish you were as sober

All that now remained for the discomfited still-hound was to ascertain the fact for himself; but, alas the day! or, rather, alas the night! it was a melancholy truth. The three casks, instead of being filled with stout mellow poteen, as they had been three or four hours before, contained nothing now but thin air. To describe the disconsolate visage and chagrin of the gauger would be impossible.

"Zounds! I am done, at last," he exclaimed; "done before my own face; and, what is worse, I shall be dismissed besides. I could take my oath the three casks were full when I first entered this room, and for two hours afterwards."

"And that," observed the Coroner, "is the very fact that will dismiss you. Now, I'll tell you what, my Trojan, had you been civil and agreeable, instead of being thankless and insolent, it might have been overlooked; but, as sure as my name is Jack Finigan, and as sure as your Inspector is my cousin, your date as a Revenue officer will be but short."

At this moment Jemmy entered the room, and, approaching the discomfited gauger, said, as he extended his hard, cartilaginous palm, "Shake hands, sir. I think I heard you say, a while ago, that you would like to do so with anyone that could over-reach you. You're a keen looking little sprassawn; but, be my sowl, you never saw the day you could measure brains wid Jemmy M'Scutt. Gintlemen, give me a glass of something till I drink the codger's health. Here's to you, and don't you look purty, standing there! Here's to you, and may you always be as successful. Faith, your mother may be proud of you." And, so saying, he emptied his glass, amidst the roars of the company, at the unfortunate exciseman, and skulked, with a double grin on him, out of the room.

Owing to the solicitations of the Squire, however, the Coroner represented the matter to his cousin in such a light as occasioned him to be only reduced; but reduced to the very lowest step in the service.

And now the reader will ask how Jemmy contrived to empty the casks without disturbing the company. By the aid of a long augur, he first bored a hole through the boards of the loft, then stuffed a sufficient quantity of paste between the cask and the boards to prevent the whiskey from flowing about the room, after which he bored another hole in the cask itself, and received the spirits, which gushed down, into different vessels, from which it was immediately transferred into smaller casks, and then carried off to a safe place in a neighbouring bog, where it was buried.*

One of Jemmy's constant companions was a dwarfish misshapen mannikin, called Bunty Scrag—a creature who passed for a fool; but was, nevertheless, a knave of the first water. He lived in the family of another sporting gentleman, who resided within a couple of miles of Castle Squander, and who was hand and glove with its proprietor. This character, whom we shall designate by the name of O'Canter, was considered, and with truth, not only the shrewdest man on the Irish turf, but also one of the most fortunate. It was well known, indeed, that he was tricking and unscrupulous, but, being too cunning and dexterous in his manœuvres, he never allowed himself to violate, in any tangible manner, the regulations of the sport. He was cheerful, hospitable, and remarkable for a strong brogue, and meek deportment; yet, in spite of the general suspicion and impressions of his being a thorough black leg, he was able to maintain a very with great plausibility. Perhaps he would have found this difficult, but being a regular fire eater, he was ready to make any doubt of, or insinuation against, his honour, a matter of personal insult, to be decided only by a meeting at ten or twelve paces.

Now it was in this man's family, or rather in his stables, that Bunty Scrag lived, for Bunty's delight was to pass his life among horses. The little scoundrel was gifted with such an astonishing memory of everything connected with the turf, that the Stud-book was fallible compared to him. He was master of the pedigree and performances of every horse in the three kingdoms, and had the reputation of being the best judge of a racer in Ireland. In nineteen cases out of twenty he never failed to place the horses, on seeing them brought to the post, or rather long before it, for no private trial ever took place that he did not contrive to witness. In fact, he was a most accomplished touter. Many of these faculties, however, were, by no means generally known; and, in order to give himself, or rather his master, O'Canter, the full advantage of this sagacious instinct, he always took care to make a sufficient number of mistakes to diminish the impression that might be felt as to the correctness of his judgment. All we will say at the present time is, that this dwarfish little knave and the huntsman were on terms of the greatest confidence; Jemmy and his master, O'Canter, being, probably, the only two who were thoroughly aware of his sagacity

I was now about two years in the family, and, I must confess, that I could not look upon the wasteful and riotous habits which I was forced to witness, without great pain. Among the other propensities of Mr Squander, as I had long before this discovered, was that of deep play, especially with his neighbour, O'Canter. That he ever could have been successful was impossible, for he drank whilst he played, and was besides utterly deficient in coolness and temper.

Another piece of extravagance to which he was addicted, in common, I must say, with most of the gentry of the West, was a habit of wagering large sums upon the most trivial arguments, especially such as were connected with the turf, play, and other subjects. "I'll bet you five pounds I'm right." "I'll bet you ten pounds—twenty—fifty"—and so on; and all these wagers should be paid.

When I was three years in the family, James, the youngest, insisted on entering college, and asked his father to allow me to enter along with him, adding that I could afford him very great assistance in his studies. To this his father at once assented.

"Certainly, James, and he shall have an ample allowance for his support."

This would have gratified me very much, but neither Dick nor Harry would listen to it. The former got into one of his towering passions, and asked, were they about to be deprived of the only companion and friend with whom they ever could agree. He, for one, would not stand that. The thing was, accordingly, given up, and I was forced to remain in what I felt to be a falling house

On the evening before James's departure for the university, he asked me to sit awhile with him in his room. At this period, I ought to say, that I had been admitted to their dinner-parties, and even to the drawing-room. I accordingly went, and found him by himself, evidently in depressed spirits, which, indeed, was natural, as he had never been a day absent from his family before. There was a decanter of wine upon the table, which was for my use, as the poor boy seldom drank himself

"Randy," said he, "before I go, I think it my duty to thank you deeply and sincerely for the pains you have taken, and the anxiety you have felt, in advancing my education. I don't think I would be justified in separating from you without giving expression to what I feel to be due to you. You had a very difficult card to play with my brothers, and perhaps no other individual could have managed them as you did. If you have not made scholars of them, you have, at all events, saved them from the disgrace of being absolutely illiterate, and that is as much, perhaps more, than any one else could accomplish. As for me, I feel deeply, as I said, the obligations which I owe you."

* This is a fact.

"With you, James," I replied, "I had no difficulty. Your talents are good, and you were assiduous in your studies. Had your brothers been equally so, they might have made a more satisfactory progress—for they are neither of them without a considerable share of intellect, if they would only use it."

"Whatever talents I possess," he replied, with emotion, "I feel that they will constitute my only fortune in life."

"What!" I replied, "and your father in possession of twelve thousand a year!"

"My father," said he, bursting into tears, "is a ruined man. His property is overloaded with mortgages; and, indeed, considering the extravagant rate at which he has lived for years, it could not be otherwise. There is a scandalous race—a senseless an insane competition among the gentry of the country at large, as to who will surpass the other in show, equipage, hospitality, and that prodigality of expenditure which is considered the exponent of wealth and fortune. Not that I believe my father is worse off than others; for the fact is, that almost every man of his class is, at this moment, in a state of bankrupt y He may weather it out for some years; but, as for me, I feel that I must depend upon my own energies and talents; and such is my resolution."

I felt the truth of this; but, at the same time, I determined not to appear to go with him in the views he had expressed.

"James," said I, "you are now depressed by a separation from your family, and you, consequently, overdraw the picture."

"No," he replied; "I have my own reasons for what I say; but that which distresses me most, is the reflection of what will become of my dear sister Emily. Poor mamma, too when the crash comes—how will she sustain it?"

He again shed tears bitterly, and I endeavoured to console him as well as I could; at length he proceeded—

"There is one man in our establishment whom I suspect to be a most treacherous and ungrateful villain."

"Pray who is he?" I asked

"Jemmy, the huntsman," he replied; "he is a bosom friend of the vile dwarf, Bunty Scrag, who is in the service of that plausible black leg, O'Canter. Now, my father has lost thousands upon thousands on the turf, and the heaviest of his losses have been always to O'Canter. I feel an impression, which I cannot shake off, that the huntsman has regularly sold him to this swindler, and been one principal cause of his embarrassments. My father is honourable, generous, and without suspicion, and will not hear a word said against old Jemmy; but, as I said, I feel that my impressions with regard to him are right. Besides, I understand that he lived with O'Canter's father before he came to us; and it was this very O'Canter, who, when commencing his career as a sportsman, recommended him to my father—and, as I suspect, for his own purposes. I mention this to you," he proceeded, "because I wish you to keep your eye upon him—upon Bunty Scrag—and, if possible, upon O'Canter also. I do not ask this upon my own account, but perhaps it may prove an act of kindness and friendship to my father"

"It is a curious enough coincidence of opinion, James," I replied; "for, I assure you, I myself have entertained strong suspicions of Jemmy the huntsman's integrity; and you may rest assured that I shall keep a strict eye on him, and, as far as opportunity will enable me, upon the other two, besides."

"My dear Randy," he proceeded, "I have much more cause of sorrow than you can imagine. My poor Uncle Tom—who, if ever a man was without spot or stain, is he too, I fear, will suffer. His little property, of three hundred a year, will go—for he will refuse my father nothing; and poor Emily, too, to whom her uncle left twelve thousand pounds absolutely at her own disposal—is too affectionate and generous to see my father degraded in the face of the country; she, too, will be involved in the ruin. Alas! my dear Randy—I leave home with a heavy and foreboding heart. You are the only person, with the exception of my uncle, to whom I have unbosomed myself; and I appeal to you whether I have not sufficient cause."

I felt my heart warm to this fine boy, and sympathised with him from my very soul, because, as I said before, I had no doubt that his apprehensions were but too well founded. Still I assumed a cheerful aspect, strove to diminish his fears for the future, and, filling my glass, took his hand and drank a brilliant career to him through college;—upon which we parted.

The next morning early I was up to see him off, but, to my surprise, neither Dick nor Harry made their appearance. They had caroused it deeply the night before, and did not feel themselves in a condition to rise at such an hour. I went to their respective bedrooms, and besought them, for the sake of common decency, to get up and see their brother before he went.

"What the devil did you disturb me for?" said Dick. "don't you think I'd rise at this hour, for father, or mother, or sister, or brother? Where's the use of it? Can't he take a run to Dublin without me seeing him? He's not going to be hanged, I'm sure, that we should go to take an everlasting farewell of him. Go to blazes out of this," he said, "and let me sleep"

I then passed to Harry's bedroom, and awoke him. "Won't you get up" said I, "and see your brother James before he goes?"

"Ah," said he, stretching himself and yawning, "poor James! is he going then?"

"Don't you know he is. Get up and see him."

"Poor James!" said he; "I'm very fond of James; but I have a severe headache, Randy; tell him so, and I am sure the kind-hearted boy will excuse me. Say I'm ill, which is the fact, otherwise I would go down with pleasure."

"Shall I bring him up to you, then?"

"No, Randy, I would rather not; I might feel too much, and the agitation might aggravate my headache. So might he, poor boy; he is, like myself, possessed of too much sensibility, and I think we ought to spare his feelings, poor lad. Say I'll write to him, and, in the meantime, give him my love."

I need scarcely assure the reader that the indignation which I felt against the two heartless young scoundrels was such as I cannot now clothe in language, especially against Harry, the hypocrite, whom I cursed in my heart. On entering the front parlour, I found his sister Emily in tears, his uncle Tom quite pale with sorrow, his father and his mother, the latter in a temporary dishabille, as she intended to return to bed the moment he was off. I apologised, as well as I could, for his brothers, and when poor James heard me a single tear ran down each cheek, but he cleared his throat and assumed more firmness. His sister Emily had her arm about his neck, as if she could scarcely part with him at all; he had been her favourite.

"Well," said he, rising up, "I must go. Dear mother, farewell, farewell, dearest mamma!" and, as he spoke, he threw his arms about her neck, kissed her, and wept. She removed him from her a little, and putting a hand on each cheek, kissed his forehead, and said, with a cold aristocratic formality, that started my indignation afresh, "Farewell, James; you are going where you will meet young men of high rank and family, and let me beseech you never to forget that you are the grandson of a noble man." She then kissed him again coldly on the forehead, and went up to bed.

"Ah!" thought I; "it is always better to be born near nature!"

The poor Squire's countenance was charged with sorrow, or rather with an affliction deeper than the mere temporary separation from his son could have produced. There was, besides, a look of compassion and remorse in his features that could not for a moment be mistaken. James, when his mother had gone, turned to him—approached him and, throwing himself into his arms, wept aloud. His father pressed him to his heart, laid his head upon his breast, and I could perceive the tears rain down from his convulsed cheeks upon the face of his son

"My darling, my noble boy!" he exclaimed, "I feel my heart smitten by the injustice which I have done you. You have much to forgive me for, dear James; but I am punished by the remorse I feel. Your uncle told me all—and of your magnanimous resolution to relieve me, by your own exertions, from the burthen of your support. Forgive me, dear James, that I did not understand you in time; and now, perhaps, it is too late."

The boy then turned to his sister, who wept upon his bosom, kissed him, and seemed as if she would never let him go. I then interfered; and said that time was pressing, and he might be too late for the coach.

"James," said Emily, "whatever you may remember, don't forget that you are my brother—my best beloved brother—and I trust you will never do anything that will call a blush to your sister's cheek"

"Come," said Master Tom, in a low voice, which he was afraid to trust, "Randy and I will see you to the coach. Richard," said he to his brother, "go to bed. God bless you, dear Richard—God bless you! and you, too, Emily must go to bed kiss me, darling."

She kissed him, weeping, and we then departed, leaving the father and daughter, each in deep sorrow, behind us in the hall.

Poor Tom proved himself a hero and a philosopher. He attempted to be jocular—talked with a vivacity and fluency which I had never witnessed before. There was, however, a villanous tremor in his voice, which no hypocrisy of affection could disguise or conceal. On helping James into the coach he slipped a purse into his hand, then squeezed it—the coach drove off; and, after following it with his eyes until it turned a corner and got out of sight, he stared at me as if I had been a spectre; then, taking my arm, we returned, in silence, to the castle. As we went along, I felt how necessary my support was to him, his arm, within mine, being tremulous, and his steps feeble. On entering the front drawing-room, he sat down, and I then saw that he was in tears. I did not speak to him, nor make any attempt to interrupt his grief—which was, in consonance with his character, deep and quiet. After some time, however, he said to me—

"Randy, you don't know the value of that boy"

"Perfectly, sir," I replied; "I had a conversation with him last night, in his own room, that confirmed and extended every favourable impression I had previously entertained of him."

"Did he tell you," said he, "that, from this day forth, it is his intention never to be a burthen upon his father?"

"Well, no," I replied; "not exactly that."

"No," replied his uncle; "he would not mention that to anyone but me. Such, however, is his resolution. But he shall not want a friend. However, what pleases me best, is his father—thank God, he now understands him, and knows his value"

Neither Emily nor her uncle returned to bed; and, I need scarcely say, that the breakfast that morning was a melancholy one. His uncle, his sister, and I partook of that meal about ten o'clock—the other members of the family about two.

(To be continued in our next.)

THE BEGINNING AND THE END.

A STORY OF THE GALLOWS.

'Tis a calm and quiet evening, season of peaceful rest,
When, nestling warm, the infant sleeps upon her mother's breast;
When homeward hies the father, his daily task all done,
And with mirth and laugh to greet him his happy children run.

But quiet evening deepens into dark and solemn night;
In a corner of the sleeping town, sacred to blood and blight,
Breaking the midnight silence, his task a workman plies
Where on the morrow's coming morn a human creature dies!

See! in his prison's stone-bound cell, marking the fleeting time,
Borne down with stupor, crushed with thought, paces the Man of Crime:
From neighbouring church each passing hour strikes through the darkling gloom—
And to-morrow, full of life and breath, he meets a felon's doom.

Brothers! look back upon his life—see him, the child of shame,
Who save in oath or savage curse, ne'er heard the Sacred name;
Whose child life was all darkness, who, more than sin and guile,
Never knew a father's teaching, never felt a mother's smile!

In a noisome crowd he cradled, his infant breath he drew,
Want was his tutor, sin his guide—the only ones he knew;
Through crooked ways of Vice and Crime his earliest pathway ran,
Until the warp'd, untutor'd boy became the desperate man!

The only school he ever knew was in the prison cell,
His teaching was in sin and wrong—he mark'd his tutors well!
His wisdom was in cunning, in fraud and lie his truth,
And the hangman ends the lesson we taught him in his youth!

* * * * * *

The night has pass'd, the morn has come, beaming with cheerful light,
To gladden man on busy earth, to aid him in his fight;
Surely a type of endless life the glorious dawn was given,
When clouds and darkness pass away,—when comes the light of heaven!

The gallows reads its lesson, once more its tale it tells,
With words of Christian preacher! with sound of Christian bells!
And, in eager haste to read it, gathers fast a heaving crowd,
With ribald song, and hideous jest, and curses deep and loud.

Brothers! 'tis time these scenes should end; we judge the full-grown man,
And leave the boy to fight his way through life as best he can;
No friend stands by to teach him, no hand is raised to save;
Untaught, forgotten, ignorant, he fills his felon's grave!

Brothers! this horrid death-tree—let it no longer stand,
Shedding its ghastly upas-shade o'er England's Christian land!
The New Year 's waiting at the door, meet time for love and good,
Brothers, be up and doing,—root out this fiend of blood!

Down with it over all the land! Where tower'd its crimson head,
Build school to teach, build church to preach, give men their daily bread!
With the Old Year dying outward, let this blatant falsehood cease,
And to all in happier England may the coming year bring Peace!

WHAT IS LIFE?

THE proudest of men, as well as the most imaginative,—the lonely weaver at his monotonous labour, and the spent dandy in his sickly morning,—the hot-eyed sempstress, and the gorgeous lady,—the dullest book-keeper, and the grandest poet,—have asked themselves, in various moods, one question,—"What is life?" The answers to this universal query would fill volumes. In each reply there is a view of the respondent's life. Let us glance at a few of them.

The first gentleman who undertakes to define life for us is not of the most amiable cast of mind; decidedly not the gentleman we should be inclined to make a voyage round the world with. He begs to inform us that life is a desolate journey, beset at every step by briers. Not at all an encouraging prospect to young people, flushed with hope, who are starting on the voyage,—who are just about to put their first finger upon the treacherous thorns. This gentleman we recognise as of that peculiar class who put mourning upon brides, reminding them, just by way of damping their present happiness,—that the morrow may find their lover in his grave. Not quite a reasonable course this, in our opinion. We all know that death is inevitable, and that a few of us, let us hope, do something as we proceed in life, to fortify us for the approach of the enemy when he advances upon us. But why be sniffing continually at the door of the charnel-house?

Another individual approaches with a definition. He is a solemn man, not to be lightly approached by any one. He is not to be trifled with on any occasion. We should say he did not smile on his wedding-day. Life, he tells us, is but a journey to the grave; therefore, men are to pucker their faces into the most serious expression, and live near an undertaker. This is a most melancholy gentleman, who wears his sadness as other men wear holiday looks,—who is, in fact, very proud of his solemn aspect. He shines at funerals; and perhaps the proudest moment of his life was when, as chief mourner, he followed his father to the grave, between rows of staring strangers.

And now comes a jovial reckless fellow. He is a little worn, we think, and the brightness of his eye suggests the use of artificial stimulants. He is a thoroughly careless man. Careless of dress, careless as a husband, careless as a father, particularly careless in business,—and careful only to imbibe his proper, or rather improper, quantity of spirits before going to bed. Yet he, with all his laissez faire logic, has his definition of life. He brings it out pathy enough, ask him when you may, to him life is a farce. He is, at bottom, a hapless individual, with very little faith in the social virtues; inclined to laugh at heroism and to palliate ruffianism; yet, himself, a thoroughly good hearted fellow.

A pretty girl now trips towards us with her definition. She is of the sentimental school; we see that at once. She has a white rose in her hair; her cheek is pale, and she sighs frequently. "Life," she says, "is a flower,—to-day, bright and beautiful, and to-morrow, nipt by the frost." We thought so; exactly the definition we expected. She is a young lady who, possessing much natural sense, and having one day opened an odd volume of philosophy, conceives that she has an insight not vouchsafed to common mortals, that she is etherealised, and that all her thoughts must be conveyed to the outer world in metaphors. She is passionately fond of flowers, adores the megatherium, and has much to say (out of an elementary geological work) on the tertiary formation. She informs her partner, in the course of a quadrille, that experience teaches her she exists as a tangible reality, but philosophy tells her that she only exists in her imagination. Many readers have met the young lady. The last we heard of her was, that she had adopted the Bloomer costume, and expected a correspy in one of her Majesty's household regiments.

And now we are to observe a very sallow young gentleman, buried in the muslin and gauze of a dozen young ladies, who are listening with open mouths. We remark that the young gentleman's hair is worn extremely long, and parted down the middle of his head. The world is allowed to see much of this young gentleman's neck, we also perceive. A glance at his shirt collar, completing the solemn picture—we recognise the unacknowledged poet; the injured individual who haunts the coteries of Islington to while away time, till posterity pronounces a final and triumphant verdict on his poems, entitled, "Sarah Anne, and other Verses." Here he is, an infinitely condescending Apollo, and the young ladies, not without trepidation, hint that they have blank leaves in their albums. To one he gives an impromptu written on the summit of Mont Blanc; to another favoured lady he presents his lines on the decease of a faithful spaniel, and, to a third, he offers an answer to the great question. Here it is. "Life is a rapid river, flowing into a mysterious sea." This definition, according to the poet's confidential friend, is true poetry, for "it leaves plenty to the imagination." Our poet deals in the vague and mysterious exclusively; and dandles Death through his verses with that sportive activity which, according to himself, only truly great minds can comprehend. He plays at football with the destinies, and terrifies young ladies by the levity with which he alludes to all that is solemn in life, and terrible in death. All this is a great pity; he would have made a capital banker's clerk. But, luckily, one of his circle has the hardihood to rebuke the presumption of his verse; to advise the cutting of his hair, and the danger in which his exposed neck runs. This bold friend is a lady, who, if she have any pride, is proud of the gentleman she "sits under." She is an uneasy maiden female of five-and-thirty, who thinks that jewellers should be indicted for openly displaying wedding-rings in their shop-windows. Her coffin is continually before her eyes. She is the same difference between it and one of "Plutarch's Lives" as there is between Johnson's "Life of Savage" and a "Life" by Isaac Walton. It is a difference of genus. When we say that the "Agricola" heads the class opposite to that to which Plutarch, Walton, and Boswell belong, we are not to be understood as excluding it from the possession of the heart-qualities of these writers. There is no less feeling in a finished and profound lyric by Tennyson, than in one of the simple, heart-free ballads in such collections as Percy's. The "Agricola" is critical, exact, profound, severe, and still gives a human portrait of the subject of it, which has all the touching reality of the homeliness of Plutarch, or the piety of Bunyan. The one writer writes as a judge—stamps himself on what he writes with intellectual superiority, while retaining his proper brotherly sympathy: the other writer has not the faculties of a judge, and is less self-conscious, and makes his own personality more simply apparent in what he does. Both works are works of genius; the former is also, properly, more a work of art. Viewed as a work of art, then, the "Agricola" is noteable for being what the Latins were wont to call totus teres atque rotundus. It is rounded off so wonderfully—round and white as Leda's egg. Within the compass of his forty-six little chapters, in the space of a review article, Tacitus gives us his great father-in-law's life complete—his expedition to Britain—his character—Britain's relation to Rome—the Imperial policy—the age and the man—in short, all exquisitely delineated. So small the compass—so complete the delineation—just as through Lord Ross's telescope you command the examination of the moon. Then there is a perpetual delight in the style which jets out every now and then in wit—true wit—by which you can see! Jeers in modern days have managed to degrade the reputation of wit; people forget what true wit is—that it is found nearly always in the greatest intellects; in Plato, Cicero, Bacon, Tacitus, Montesquieu, Pascal. In Tacitus, for example, the epigrams all come in like little lamps in an illumination—making the way bright and clear.

Now, it is the fact of the immense success of this biography which has led so many moderns to try their hands at a classical one. No one scarcely is content to delineate a human story both simply and naturally; he must delineate his theory about it. He must resemble the pedant in "Moliere," who asks his mistress to come and see the dissection of a very fine woman. The ship having made its voyage, it does not satisfy one of these fellows to say how she looked, what adverse winds she fell in with, how the sky looked overhead—even what they had to eat and drink aboard, which is, at least, a matter of human interest. No;—he must lay down the course, define the latitude and longitude, note the variations of the compass. In plain language, he must become a pedant and a bore.

Hence it is that the real, charming, readable biographies are those which make no such scientific pretence; fellows write them from love, or stupid wonder, or mere eccentricity—consequently, write them naturally. If you want, therefore, the pleasure of a genuine biographical reading, you will find it in books far more like the "Children in the Wood" than the "Lives" of Cornelius Nepos—though Catullus has dedicated to him, and his Latin is delicious. We would even say that "Puss in Boots" is a better biography than some noteable ones we could name; for "Puss" is, at all events, a cat, and these ones contain nothing really like a Man!

Among good natural biographies there is a very strange one—one that is really peculiar. It is the "Life of Spinoza," by Jean Coler. But for that little book we should really know nothing of Spinoza, personally. Luckily for the great Jew, however, good Jean Coler, Lutheran minister at the Hague, took lodgings in the house where he had lived; the "chamber in which I study (on the second floor) being the one where he slept," says Jean. In consequence of this, and of Jean's being an open-hearted, true man, we have a distinct image of the philosopher extant at this hour—an olive-Jewish-faced man; bright-eyed, dressed like a "simple bourgeois"—working hard—living on gruel and little messes—addicted to tobacco—coming down stairs to chat with his landlady about "my predecessor's" sermon. And yet Jean feared and hated (or tried to hate) Spinoza's life and work generally, and even alludes to him as "ce malheureux," and once kicks at him as "Satan!" The good Jean, however, was better-hearted than he knew. So great is the force of nature in a man! Goldsmith could not look repelling enough to snub a pig-butcher; and Jean Coler wrote a first-rate biography in spite of himself.

Another biography, delightful for the same qualities, is Roper's "Life of Sir Thomas More"—"Son Roper," who married Sir Thomas's daughter. This little book, like your first-rate biographies generally, is a mere pamphlet in size. How different from such huge tomes as "Gifford's Life of Pitt!" How different from Sir James Mackintosh's "Life of Sir Thomas More"—a good biography, too, in a bad way! It is true that Mackintosh must be read; but Roper is loved. He introduces us to the family. He shows us the grave and gentle old man walking with his friends at Chelsea, the wise and homely being that he was

"My father in his habit as he lived!"

Biographies like these are Freemason Lodges, where men of all ages meet as brothers.

Then there is another such book, more eccentric a great deal, but a very loveable book—one which has received the distinct, genial, and emphatic commendation of Charles Lamb. It is the "Life of the Duke of Newcastle, by his Duchess." The Duke was not a great man, nor his Duchess a great writer.—But the Life of one written by the other is a capital and most interesting biography. We sympathise with the stately, pedantic Cavendish (a kind of Gold Stick of a man) in his dreary Royalist exile; we are interested in knowing how civilly his creditors treated him, supplying him with "all kinds of food and drink" for long years of waiting. We love the good lady whose jewels were forthcoming instantly, should pawning be necessary. And surely the laugh is good-natured which is excited by the curious pedantic wherein she collects the various sayings of her lord—not one of which rises above the ordinary intellect of well-dressed mankind. Only once, if we remember right, does he even distantly approach the realms of epigram. On that one occasion he declared "y^e^ Spanish horse to be y^e^ gentleman among horses"—a curious relic of imbecile Feudalism.

The "Lives" of Isaac Walton—

"Satellites burning in a lucid ring Around most Walton's heavenly memory," as Wordsworth so beautifully calls them, will always be specially honoured in literary remembrance. Simplicity unalloyed by weakness—that charming genuineness where no pity mingles with the love—only honour—a whiteness, as of gray hairs—distinguish that book. Another biographer who is true! Donne and Hooker live again in his pages. Their images strike upon you like the figures of knights in an ancient church. Emerson says, somewhere, in his superb, fanciful way, "that it would seem as if the great minerals of the earth occasionally sent up a man made of themselves, to explain them." We might apply the theory to Walton, and declare him the human representative of marble—the stone of purity and record; so clearly, so beautifully his pages tell the story of the dead whose memory they conserve.

These works, in their various ways, are types of the best order of biographies; and they are few. Biographies of the classical school again are abundant as dead leaves. But everything may be well done in its way; and though few people will, now-a-days, rave in praise of Bayle of the Dictionary Bayle, at all events, is readable, and contains immense biographical information. For he, at least, was genuine as far as he went—loved his scholarship and his books; and, whether the subject be Ovid or Luther, Lucretius or Heloise, he is down on you readily with his copious reading, his smart, dexterous reasoning, and his unwearied vivacity. The logical and lively Peter, indeed, is eminently readable. He is so very literary, also, that you would occasionally forget he was human—unless he reminded you of it by showing a taste for "improper" and amusing speculations and anecdotes. Peter's death was the most thoroughly literary on record. He woke up one morning, and inspected a "proof" while his housekeeper was lighting his fire. The honest woman puffed away at the sticks, which crackled hopefully for boiling his coffee. But Death had been inspecting his proofs in the interim, and had sternly blotted Peter out. When the housekeeper turned round, her clear-eyed master was dead.

Our modern habit of preserving people's letters so carefully, ought, surely, to make biography a much easier business. With the very entrails of the man before him, shall not the biographical augur favour us with luminous remarks? There is Middleton, who wrote the "Life of Cicero," he surely wanted neither materials, nor scholarship, nor admirable talents. No: but he wanted human eyes, and the curse of pedantry was on his brain, and the curse of France was on his style, and it would be less fatiguing to read all his authorities than to read his book! There are Johnson's "Lives,"—we cannot assign them a first-rate place among biographies. We read them, though, we should hope! Johnson's style is at its best, by-the-by, in the said "Lives," much less grandiloquent than in the "Rambler" and "Rasselas,"—more like his conversation. And why is not his style always like his conversation, and immortal? Because the good Doctor lived and wrote in the classical tradition; and, in general, you can scarcely feel the beating of his great heart through the thick skin of his systematic style! Hence his biographies do not rank with Plutarch and Walton's. As might be expected, the "Savage" is the best of them. It is one of the very few didactic biographies which one enjoys. Condorcet's "Voltaire" is another.

Mitford's "Life of Gray," a perfectly mediocre performance, ("parfaitement ennuyeux!" said Talleyrand, when he heard somebody called "ennuyeux") claims this one distinction,—it's form suggested Boswell's form. What he achieved by suggesting that, everybody knows. By right of his heart, Boswell belongs to the immortals. His head alone would carry him the other way. Like the youths in Virgil's Elysian fields, who win their right to the myrtle grove by dying for love, Boswell owes his honour to his affection. He is certainly underrated, however, even as regards his talent. For, consider the selection, disposition, dramatic rendering of all he heard and saw of Johnson, in his book; the exquisite management which becomes clearer to you in proportion as you thoroughly study it! Those argue real intellectual qualities. Many a man, by having a worse heart, has come to be falsely taken to have a better understanding. Many a more cautious man has come to be thought an abler man, because he was more cautious. It is easy enough to avoid being caught tripping, by making up your mind only to creep! But it is too late, now-a-days, one hopes, to discuss Boswell's Johnson! Do we like rain in summer? Do we love our country?

We may note here, that when a biography is a good book, the subject of it is always a good man, and worthy. Nature abhors the canonisation of scoundrels and fools, though men try it frequently. Wooden monuments rot. The air, the wind, summer and sunshine are against them. Often a ponderous preservation of a bad man is attempted; but the bad odour of him breaks through the lead! How natural that bad men should have dull, dead biographies,—as toads get preserved, in stone!

When we come to our own day, which the reader is possibly anxious that we should do, we find in biography, as in other departments, more heart and life,—a desperate effort to break through classical trammels,—a determination to picture people livingly, or to leave them alone. The Giffords, the Listers, the Mallets, the Dixes, are as good as defunct. Human nature revolts at them. The writer who doubts his ability to execute a "Life," modestly publishes his hero's correspondence, and honestly leaves you to make him out for yourself. This, the honest class does, and "Memoirs" abound in the land, and great good is done by the publication of letters. Bad biographers still, of course pursue the old game; catching yearly less and less. Dix's "Life of Chatterton" is even vanishing from the very stalls, and shrinks from the light of the sun. Old documents are ferreted out, that truth may appear. For a long time, we remarked

"—— the blind mechanic's curious
That pack the heavy freight," and now, the higher class of minds are aiming to blend into classical forms, and to shape into works of art, materials illumined by that reviving spirit of love and sympathy with which biography ought to be approached. The romantic woos the classical for its bride, and says, with Herrick,

"When I meet thy silvery feet,
My soul I'll pour into thee!"

Several writers of our time illustrate these observations, and stand out, in their various forms, fresh and living types of growth in the literary fields. Witness the graceful good-heartedness of Lamb Blanchard's "Memoir of L. E. L.;" the tender, sympathetic story of Keats's "Life," by one whom we noticed the other day among the "Oriental Travellers;" Mr. Hepworth Dixon's vivid, steel-clear representations of Howard and Penn, shown as in a steel mirror,—brightly, though hardly; the luminous, high-toned vivacity of Forster's "Life of Goldsmith;" and that great book, the "Life of Sterling," by Thomas Carlyle, which is a Plutarchian "Life," and an "Agricola," both in one!

Such books as this last are the hope of biography, and their influence must be felt for ever in it. But, of course, there are biographies without these high pretensions, which, as works of scholarship, industry, good sense, and power, are not to be passed over in an article on biography. No view we may take of the high functions of the biographer should prevent us duly honouring these. The man would deserve to have his life written by Dix who should neglect the clear, gentle conciseness of the little "Life of Luther" by Melancthon; the honest warmth and homely ease in M'Crie's "Life of Knox," Moore's graphic and brilliant Memoirs of Sheridan and Byron; Lockhart's high-hearted, brightly-written "Life of Scott;" an! the vigorous verbosity of Brougham's "Statesmen," which, at all events, moves. It is pleasant, too, to have an opportunity of noticing a well-done thing not well-known. Let us honourably mention the really well-written "Memoir of Chatterton," prefixed to the Cambridge edition of his poems; Southey's "Nelson" and "Kirke White" are familiar to all.

Mr. Disraeli's "Bentinck," as a political biography, is, properly, not a biography, in the sense in which we have been using the word, at all; for every politician, as we apprehend, a man, too, and not a mere debater and statistician. But Mr. Disraeli gives us only a parliamentary summary no life. It is all Hansard. It is a blue-book biography. Fancy Dr. Johnson a literary biography, or Mozart a musical biography. Who could read them but literati and musicians? This choice of Mr. Disraeli is the more unfortunate, as, after all, the interest of Lord George's career does not lie in his merely public achievements; his personal character is what interests the country, and we will bet (here is a chance for a speculator) that "Lord George Bentinck, a Sporting Biography,"—giving three years of his best sporting life, when everybody liked him, and honoured him, in his then capacity,—would beat Disraeli's book hollow! It would show his hero as picturesquely as he could be shown; would paint his image on the retina of the country's eye more clearly, far, than that book does. It would be, in truth, a better "biography," if our remarks have at all shown what a biography ought to be. How strange it is that the author, writing of his friend and comrade, never for an instant invests him with the touching characteristics of one who has been loved and lost! Debate follows debate, laboured sentence follows laboured sentence; we are buried in cotton, and soused into sugar, keel-hauled under the clumsy vessel of Protection till we are half-drowned, in fact! It is an apologetic epitaph, too long to read, much less to remember.

Shall we not take a lesson from all manner of biographical failures, and write our biographies in a better way? We know why the men who died "before Agamemnon" are forgotten, don't we? Horace, we believe, says it was because they wanted "vate sacro!" Ah! the essence of it lies in the sacro! And the source of the sacred is the Heart! J. H.

OPENING OF PARLIAMENT.—THE DEBATE ON THE ADDRESS.

THE annual Opening of the Session of the high Parliament of Great Britain is always an event of European as well as of national interest. At the present strange crisis of the world's history when, with some trifling exceptions, it is the only free Parliament in Europe, its solemn inauguration is of more than usual importance. This old Parliament—the model and the envy of nations—meets for the first time in a new edifice; but it meets on the old historical site, and, let us trust, with the old historical spirit, determined to maintain the country which it represents in its old and high position, free and independent at home, respected abroad by every other nation that aspires to be free, and dreaded only by the enemies of human rights and the real progress of civilisation.

The Speech delivered by the Sovereign on these occasions is seldom of a character to call for much, if any, criticism, except it be judged by its concealments rather than by its avowals. In the present instance the Royal manifesto has not proved itself a departure from the ordinary routine. It recals facts of which the public are perfectly well informed, and comments upon them with the vaguest generalities of expression. The Queen reminds her Parliament that the war of Schleswig-Holstein may possibly be at an end, that the war at the Cape of Good Hope is certainly not at an end, and that Ireland continues to be disturbed by agrarian outrages fatal to the best interests of that portion of the empire. Passing to more agreeable topics, her Majesty congratulates the country on the prosperous state of the revenue; hints in no ambiguous terms that our system of law and equity is to be reformed, so as to make justice more cheap, more speedy, and more certain; promises representative institutions to the remote colony of New Zealand; and last, but by no means least, expresses a belief that the present is a fitting time to consider whether it may not be advisable to reform the Reform Bill.

But upon no one of these points is public interest very largely excited. The affairs of Schleswig-Holstein, the only foreign topic that is mentioned, have become things of the past, effete and dead compared with the palpable, vigorous, and living questions excited by the state of affairs among our nearest neighbours. Accordingly we find, that, as soon as the Queen had retired, and the formalities of moving and seconding the Address of both Houses in reply to her Majesty's Speech had been gone through, the real business of the night began. The state of affairs in France, and the supposed connexion of those affairs, direct or indirect, with the dismissal from office of one of the most able and popular statesmen who ever superintended the foreign department of the Government, came immediately under notice. The Premier was called upon for an explanation of the dismissal of Lord Palmerston—a dismissal, we must say, which has excited regret in every foreign country where freedom of speech and of writing, and wholesome political action, are esteemed and practised; and which has excited satisfaction, if not exultation, in every country where despotism was either nascent or triumphant. The country learns at last, from the lips of Lord John Russell, a fact previously asserted and believed, that the downfal of liberty in France produced the downfal of Lord Palmerston in England. The relation of these circumstances is indubitable, though far from being clear; and, as explained by Lord John Russell, does not seem, in our humble judgment, to have been at all necessary. In the first place, it appears that Lord John Russell, on behalf of himself and of his colleagues, was not satisfied that Lord Palmerston should have received the Kossuth deputations, and more especially that his Lordship on one of those occasions should have given utterance to expressions calculated to offend the Government of Austria, if not to compromise his own personal dignity. Lord John Russell, though annoyed at Lord Palmerston's famous indiscretion in his "nozzle-holding" speech, consented to pass it by, and, from that time until Louis Napoleon consummated his coup d'état, remained on the usual terms of cordiality and joint responsibility with the Foreign Secretary. In a conversation with the French Ambassador in London, and in a note to the British Ambassador in Paris, both of which Lord Palmerston considered personal and private, but which Lord John Russell considers to have been public and ministerial, and of a nature to implicate, if not to bind, his whole Cabinet, Lord Palmerston expressed to M. Walewski and to Lord Normanby his opinion that the coup d'état of Louis Napoleon was necessary and inevitable, and the only possible solution of a grave difficulty augmenting from day to day, and from hour to hour. Lord John Russell, from whose speech we cannot distantly gather any clue by which to ascertain what he is to be considered an admirer or an opponent of the system pursued by the President, took umbrage at Lord Palmerston's act. Dissatisfied as he was before, his Lordship needed but slight provocation to quarrel with the Foreign Secretary. Fortified by the advice which, it appears, the late Sir Robert Peel had given on his retirement from office—advice tendered not alone to Lord John Russell, but to the Queen—the Premier insisted, that, as a matter of strict constitutional practice, the real Foreign Minister should be the Premier himself. Lord Palmerston admitted the fact, but insisted on his private right to express a private opinion to an ambassador on the matters connected with his department. Hereupon issue was joined; and Lord Palmerston, on the sole responsibility of Lord John Russell, without consultation with his colleagues, was ejected from office. The colleagues of the Premier afterwards ratified the act.

Such is the short summary of these remarkable transactions. Lord John Russell and Lord Palmerston have both been heard; and not only this country, but the public opinion of Europe, wherever such a thing is allowed to exist, will judge between them. We will simply state, in reference to both speeches, that Lord John Russell's was the bolder and more confident; and Lord Palmerston's the weaker and more embarrassed, of the two. The fact seems to be, that the late Foreign Secretary is conscious of a certain amount of indiscretion in his too loose, too easy, and too confident intercourse of opinion with the Kossuth deputations; and that he admits such unrestrained communications on the part of high official personages like himself to be at all times impolitic, and, in the actual circumstances of Europe, to partake not simply of impolicy, but of danger.

There is, however, another and far more important fact, which the people of England should well consider, and which the various states of the Continent should well consider also. Has Lord Palmerston been dismissed because he approved of a violent coup d'état? Is Lord John Russell, in so dismissing him, to be considered a friend of the defunct liberties of France? and is Lord Palmerston, late the friend and ally and main supporter of liberal opinions throughout Europe, now to be considered their foe? Is Lord John Russell to be held as the friend of the free Republic in France, and Lord Palmerston the upholder and abettor of an act that destroyed a Republic, and substituted an unmitigated, monotonous, and monopyonous despotism in lieu of it? These are simple questions, which must not be obscured by the dust attempted to be thrown in our eyes by the ministerial explanations that have been given. On closely comparing the speeches of the two great gladiators of Tuesday evening, we find little or no difference of opinion between them as to the course which this country ought to pursue with reference to France. We find also that the impugned sentiments of Lord Palmerston upon the coup d'état are limited to that act, and by no means extend beyond it. It is one thing to be convinced that a coup d'état is inevitable, and that under perilous circumstances illegal acts may be committed for the sake of the public safety; but it is another thing to approve of illegal acts when danger has passed away. A fireman may command a house to be pulled down when another house is on fire, in order that the conflagration may be prevented from spreading to a whole street or a whole town; but if, when the fire is extinguished, the fireman breaks into another house, and steals the silver plate, we judge his violence by another code. The destruction in the one case is to be forgiven, if not applauded; the robbery in the other is to be condemned and punished. Just so is the case of Louis Napoleon. Lord Palmerston approved of his conduct while he was pulling down the house to prevent a conflagration, but he is not to be supposed as approving of it when he stole those valuables, public liberty and private right, after the fire was put out. Upon the whole, it seems as if the actual and entire truth had not come out in this debate. Whether or no, the dismissal of Lord Palmerston is doubly damaging to the Ministry—damaging in the first place for the loss of such a man; and damaging in the second for the lame and unsatisfactory explanations which have been offered of it.

AN EAGLE IN THE SECRET.—It is reported, on the authority of a well-informed person, that the celebrated painter, Horace Vernet, received, last week, an invitation to visit the Palace of the Tuileries, where he was requested by the Minister of the Interior to sketch an heraldic eagle, which the President required as a mate emblem for the new arms of France. The answer of the artist was, that he could not do it. "Wherefore?" said the Minister. "Because," replied the painter, "the old Imperial eagle is the genuine and the best emblem of the new Empire, inasmuch as it is equally alluding to its tyranny." We may suppose the answer did not perfectly agree with the Presidential purpose. But such a trifle was not the only, nay, the real motive of the interview. The Minister had something more important to communicate to the visitor. It is well known that Horace Vernet exhibited, last year, an equestrian portrait of the President, plainly attired as a General of the National Guard, and surrounded by a brilliant staff around the centre of which General Changarnier, who is now exiled, is most conspicuous. The momentous question was, then, to ask the painter whether he would make some alterations in the aforesaid painting, that is to say, turn the President with the insignia of a thorough-bred General of the army, and brush out the untoward portrait of General Changarnier. The pain the artist did not relish better than the first, and he declined, once more, to comply with the childish vanity of the President. The embellishment very soon followed. Horace Vernet, who had for twenty years past acted as a chef de bataillon in the National Guard, has not been re-appointed by the President.

THE annual report of the normal and model schools for Upper Canada, just issued, shows that education is making real progress in this province, although there yet remains much to be done. The free school system is finding favour with the people, the number of free schools returned being 202. The superintendent of education, however, makes it appear that there are 100,000 children of school age who are attending no school.

THE Somerset County Protectionist Association have convened a meeting to be held on the 18th inst., the avowed object of which is to bring forward a candidate in opposition to Mr. Pinney, the present Liberal member. The late polling returns, it is said, show a majority in favour of the Conservatives.

On Tuesday the Queen's Speech was read in Paris through the medium of the submarine telegraph in an hour or so after its delivery, being at the same time announced and disseminated by the Electric Telegraph Company through all the chief towns of the United Kingdom.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL INTELLIGENCE.

PARISIANA

(From our own Correspondent.)

THURSDAY, Feb. 5, 1852.

If the daily returns of the arrivals in this capital are faithful to truth Paris is just now tolerably full; the statements in the Government papers for the last fortnight giving something more than a thousand a day, among whom are a considerable number of foreigners: the English, however, are certainly less numerous than in former seasons. The present Carnival, on the whole, seems scarcely, if at all, less lively than in bygone years; for, though the great mansions remain inhospitably closed, the theatres and other places of public amusement are the more crowded in consequence, and official dinners, balls, and soirées are, besides, the order of both day and night. At these the foreign guests from all parts, but more particularly from England, are treated with marked courtesy and distinction. In addition to these, some of the Russian nobility are giving nightly entertainments in so splendid a style, that they are thought to be par ordre. The Count and Countess Woronzoff, the Princess Galitzin, and the Prince and Princess Kerzinkoff have all thrown open their hotels during the past week, with dinners, balls, and concerts. The Carnival balls at the Grand Opera are likewise well attended; so that Paris, if not in reality gay, at least wears the same smiling appearance as in former days, and is still the same pleasure-hunting community it ever has been, in the best, as in the worst of times. Our motto here is decidedly—

Tristitiam et metus
Tradam protervis portare ventis!

Last week's obituary contains a name of a certain celebrity in a sombre way, that of M. Gannal, the inventor of the new embalming system. His career was a singular one. Apprenticed to an apothecary in early life, he imbibed that taste for, and acquired that knowledge of, chemistry, which subsequently proved so serviceable to him. At the commencement of the century, the conscription forcibly took him from his favourite studies In a short time he became attached to the medical corps of the French army in Germany, and was present at some of the great battles of Napoleon against Prussia and Austria, and performed part of the medical staff in the Russian campaign. In the disastrous retreat which followed, he was taken prisoner at Wilna; but on four occasions succeeded in making his escape, and was as often recaptured. After a thousand adventures by flood and field, in 1815 he returned to France, where his acquirements soon obtained for him a place at the School of Pharmacy, and he made several curious discoveries in chemistry, which, however, with the exception of a prize at the Académie des Sciences, procured him no real advantage; until his great discovery of embalming by means of an arterial preparation, which in a few years made him master of a large fortune Among the many celebrities whose return to our native dust was delayed for a few years by Gannal's process, the only one exposed to the eyes of the multitude was the Leroic Archbishop of Paris, whose death—one of the noblest in all history—it will be recollected, took place at the barricades of June, 1848. That specimen of Gannal's art gave by no means a favourable idea of the process, for the fine placed features of the prelate were swollen to a degree of distortion, and the holy calmness of death was altogether destroyed

While on the subject of the late venerated Archbishop of Paris, it is not out of place to relate an act of Christian liberality on the part of his successor, who still occupies the archiepiscopal chair, worthy the highest eulogium. Until very lately, no funerals were permitted except to partake of the Sacrament; their children were refused baptism, and they were interred without funeral rites Owing to the really Christian toleration of Monseigneur Sibour, this bigoted exclusion, a disgrace to the Catholic Church in Paris, has been repealed. Though an uncompromising republican, the venerable prelate is highly esteemed by all in Paris for his unbounded charity and truly evangelical conduct. He was appointed by General Cavaignac in 1848.

All who have been in Paris will remember that large square of unoccupied ground between the southern alley of the Champs Elysées and the Seine, on which the temporary building of the Exposition of Industry was constructed, and which forms so ungraceful a contrast to the elegance of the avenue: it is about to be railed in, sown with grass, and the gazelles will be transferred thither from the menagerie in the Jardin des Plantes. A broad alley will surround the enclosure, macadamized in the middle for carriages, with wide flagged footpaths on either side. At night it will be lighted by candelabras, in the style of those in the Place de la Concorde.

The musical week has been signalised by one great event, the production at the Italiens of Beethoven's "Fidelio," which on Saturday night drew together as fashionable and crowded an auditory as ever filled the aristocratic Salle Ventadour. The chef d'œuvre of the great German master was listened to with religious attention; to their agreeable surprise, the audience finding, that, notwithstanding his formidable reputation, Beethoven was capable of imparting pleasure even to ears trained only to the melodies of Rossini, Bellini, and Donizetti. The applause, in consequence of this pleasing disappointment was unbounded. The execution was confided to the deus dello ex machina Cruvelli, and all the principal artistes. It were superfluous to describe the performance of the young prima donna, which is known to all the habitues of the opera in London; suffice it to say that the effect she produced on the auditory has seldom been equalled by any artiste on the lyrical stage in Paris. The great air in the first act, in which Beethoven has so exquisitely woven the accents of hope with the agonies of despair, was followed by a burst of applause and a shower of bouquets, the first of which was thrown by the Princess Mathilde, who was present, with a brilliant party, as was the President of the Republic, surrounded by a host of friends. The orchestra, under Maestro Hiller, was perfect, and contributed largely to the success of the opera.

Mr. Lumley is actively engaged in concluding his arrangements for the season in London. His troupe will combine three stars of the first magnitude; namely, Mdlle. Wagner, Mdlle. Cruvelli, and Mdme. Sontag a brilliant trio, all from the North, who threaten to overthrow the old supremacy of the South, these ladies being all Germans. In addition to your late well-appointed troupe, you will have M. Gassco as principal tenor, M. Ferlotti as baritone, and De Bassini as basso profundo; besides, of course, the great Lablache, who, you will be pleased to hear, is now convalescent, after a rather severe illness. Among the new lights of the ballet, it is understood you are to have Mdlle. Priora from Milan, now the support of the Grand Opera here; and Mdlle. Bagdanoff from St. Petersburg, a model of lightness and grace.

Among the musical news, I may mention that Ernst is just now the lion of our concerts. His second soiree musicale has just taken place at Herz's, and was crowded to excess by enthusiastic admirers.

FRANCE.

The organic laws, which form the complement of the new Constitution, continue to make their appearance. On Tuesday the new electoral law, which regulates the election of the members of the Corps Legislatif, was promulgated. It is divided into five chapters, each containing several articles. The first chapter treats of the mode of electing the Legislative body; the second defines the nature and conditions of the franchise; the third determines the eligibility of candidates; the fourth refers to penal enactments; and the fifth deals with matters of general arrangement and provisions. A table is appended of the number of deputies or each department.

The following are the main provisions of the law:—

Each department returns a deputy for every 35,000 electors; should there remain a number of electors equal to 25,000, then there will be an additional member. The total number of deputies will be 261.

Algeria and the colonies do not send deputies.

Each department is divided into electoral circonscriptions equal to the number of deputies allowed, according to a table annexed. This table will be revised every five years.

The suffrage is direct and universal, with vote by ballot. The votes are to be taken at the chef-lieu of the commune, and the polling sections are to be proportiona s to the number of electors.

The electoral colleges are convoked by decree of the Executive Power, and the interval between the decree of convocation and the election must be twenty-one days at the least.

The candidate to be deputy must have the absolute majority, or clear half, of the votes given; and these votes must be equal in any case to a fourth of the names of electors on the inscription lists. Should there be a second ballot, then the relative majority will do: and if the votes should be equal, then the senior candidate is to be considered as elected.

A deputy chosen for different places must communicate his option to the President of the legislative body. Vacancies caused by death or otherwise must be filled up within six months.

Deputies cannot be prosecuted for opinions expressed in the Legislative Body. Deputies cannot be arrested during the session, or during the six weeks which precede or follow the session. No deputy can be prosecuted for a criminal offence without leave of the Legislative Body, unless taken en flagrant délit.

All Frenchmen of twenty-one years of age, in the enjoyment of political and civil rights, are electors after six months residence in the commune. Soldiers and sailors on service are to have their votes reckoned at the commune which they had previously inhabited.

The exceptions are, persons deprived of civil and political rights, or condemned to infamous penalties, or deprived by express sentence of a tribunal of the right of voting, or condemned for misdemeanour even to three months' imprisonment, or for having outraged public morals or religion, or attacked the principle of property and the rights of family. Amongst those deprived of the electoral right are those condemned to a month's imprisonment for rebellion, for insults addressed to public authorities, or to a juror, or to a witness giving evidence, or for having violated the law concerning clubs or attroupements, or hawking papers or publications. Persons convicted of such offences cannot be placed on the lists of electors for five years.

Then follow the rules regulating the mode of keeping the electoral lists.

Candidates for the Corps Legislatif are eligible on reaching twenty-five years of age, without any condition of domicile. Persons who are deprived of their electoral rights by judgments of the tribunals are ineligible as candidates. A deputy condemned to like penalty loses his seat, and cannot be re-elected.

A paid public functions are incompatible with the office of deputy. Should a deputy accept a paid public situation, he loses his seat at once. Certain public officers cannot be candidates for seats until six months shall have elapsed from the time of the resignation of their employment.

Persons become liable to penalties who vote without right, or forge names of voters, or give false names, or enter a polling place with arms, or bribe, or menace, or spread false alarms, or do anything, in fact, calculated to interfere with the regular course of election.

A special law will regulate the manner of taking the votes of the army for the election of President of the Republic.

The bureau of the Electoral College or section is to be composed of a president, four assessors, and a secretary, whom they will take from amongst the electors; but the secretary so appointed has only a consultative power in the deliberations of the bureau. The colleges are to be presided over by the mayors, deputy mayors, and municipal councillors of the commune, or, in their absence, the presidents will be designated by the mayors from amongst electors who can read and write.

According to the Sanitar list, the department of Seine (Paris) will have nine members; the Lower Seine (Rouen), six members; the Nord, eight members. After these, the Côtes du Nord, Gironde, and Somme come the highest, having each five members. Aisne, Calvados, Charente, Dordogne, Finisterre, Garonne, Ile et Vilaine, Loire et Marne, Rhin, Rhone, Saône, Sarthe, and Seine et Oise have each four members. The other departments have only from three to one.

The elections are to take place on the 29th February.

A decree, which settles the electoral divisions of departments, appeared on Wednesday.

By another decree, female religious congregations may be legalised, on conforming with certain rules.

The insurgent trials in course of proceeding have been all suspended, and every document connected with such prisoners is ordered to be remitted to commissions composed of magistrates and military and administrative authorities, who are to make their decisions before the end of the present month, subject to revision by the Government.

The testamentary executors of the late King Louis Philippe, viz, MM. Dupin, Baplard, Barrot, Berryer, Berville, Count de Montmorency, and the Count de Montalivet, have entered a most strenuous protest against the decree of the President of the Republic confiscating the Orleans property. The protest shows clearly that the decree is contrary to all laws, rights, and usages, and that, if carried into effect, it would be most disastrous to the persons affected by it. They thus conclude:—

Coming to the consequences of the recent decree, it is not only the property of the family which it attacks, but it overturns all the intervening acts, whether between the severa. members of that family or of third parties.

The civil engagements arising from this unfortunate decree to certain children of the King, dowries have been fixed by eight contracts of marriage: diplomatic treaties have intervened with regard to them with eight foreign Powers; terms of five children of the King have predeceased him; they are represented by heirs, who are minors, some French, others foreigners. One part of the property of the donation has been sold; others have been affected by loans. Hereditary rights of foreign Princes, rights of minors, rights of third parties—the decree attacks all, reverses all.

Moreover, in overturning the testament of the King, the decree breaks even that of Madame Adelaide, his sister-in-law.

The King and Madame had, in fact, combined their testamentary dispositions in such a manner as to prevent the parcelling out in the hands of the children of the whole of the property of which they were proprietors. For this purpose the first of the survivors of the two made his own will as had also the second. The two testaments harmonised in this manner to carry out their joint intentions of equality among all.

That equality would disappear if the testament of the King should be destroyed, and the testament of the King is destroyed if the property of the donation is abstracted from the common patrimony. In fact, can the possessor of the property escaping from the testamentary disposition preserve the part assigned to him by the testament, when the decree strikes down the property belonging to his co-heirs?

It is to this point of view of the testamentary execution confided to our care that our mandate is engaged, and that we have a mission of duty to appeal to the more enlightened justice of the chief of the state. On every point we demand judgment.

It is a question of property which the decree affects; and it affects it, so to speak, by the application of principles of public law, so much so that the decision of questions of this sort belongs essentially to those tribunals whose authority is final.

In conclusion, the testamentary executors of the late King Louis Philippe cannot be silent upon the great acts of royal clemency promulgated by the decree of the 22d of January; though strangers to the point of law, these acts would appear unhappily to have exercised very great influence upon the solution of the question, and cannot be rectified by them.

According to the decrees, the family of Orleans would possess 300,000,000f. of immovable property in France, and division being made of the property of the donation, more than 100,000,000f. would remain to them. These figures could not have been furnished but by persons absolute strangers to the affairs of the family of Orleans.

The testamentary executors of the late King Louis Philippe, whose mission it was to inquire thoroughly into the whole matter, are in a situation to affirm that both the statements are completely erroneous. Moreover, they attest that the execution of the decree of Jan. 22, 1852, would almost be the complete ruin of the heirs of the late Louis Philippe. They hope, then, that they shall not have made a vain appeal to the justice and fair dealing of the President of the Republic.

The feelings of the Orleans family on the subject are evinced in the following letter addressed by the testamentary executors of their father by the Duke de Nemours and the Prince de Joinville:—

TO THE TESTAMENTARY EXECUTORS OF KING LOUIS PHILIPPE.

Claremont, January 29, 1852 Gentlemen,—We have received the protest which you have drawn up against the decree of confiscation issued against us, and we thank you very sincerely for your efforts to resist injustice and violence. We have found it quite natural that you should have devoted your attention especially to the question of law, without noticing the insults heaped in the preambles of these decrees on the memory of the King our father. For a moment we thought of abandoning the reserve which exile imposes upon us, for the purpose of repelling in our own persons the attacks so shamefully cast upon the best of fathers, and, we do not fear to add, on the best of Kings. But, on considering the matter more maturely, it appeared to us that to such imputations a disdainful silence was the best answer. We will, therefore, not lower ourselves to point out how particularly odious the calumnies are, when brought forward by a man who, on two different occasions, received proofs of the magnanimity of King Louis Philippe, and whose family never received anything from him but benefits. We leave it to public opinion to do justice to the words, as well as to the acts, which accompanies them; and if we are to believe the testimonies of sympathy which we receive from every side, we are sufficiently revenged. To the honour of a country to which the King our father has given eighteen years of peace, of prosperity, and of dignity—of a country which we his sons have loyally served—to the honour of that France which is always the mother country which we love—we are happy to observe that these disgraceful decrees, and their still more disgraceful preambles, have not dared to appear except under the régime of the state of siege, and after the suppression of all the guarantees which protected the liberties of the nation. In finishing, we beg of you, gentlemen, to express our warm feeling of gratitude to the eminent men of all parties who have offered to us the assistance of their talent and their courage. We accept that assistance with great pleasure, persuaded that, in today defending our cause, they defend the rights of the whole of French society. Receive, gentlemen, the assurance of our sentiments of affection.—LOUIS D'ORLEANS, Duke of Nemours; F. D'ORLEANS, Prince of Joinville."

Several Bishops, among whom are mentioned the Archbishop of Paris and the Bishops of Orleans and Rennes, have renounced, on the part of the poor clergy, all share assigned by the decree of the 22d ult. in the spoil of the House of Orleans.

Much comment has been excited by a grand dinner given at the Elysée by Louis Napoleon on Thursday week to a large party of the English aristocracy at present in Paris. It is regarded as a demonstration on the part of Louis Napoleon of his desire to maintain friendly relations with England, and of the groundlessness of the apprehensions expressed in many of the London journals of the probability of his engaging France in a war with this country. The only French gentlemen present on the occasion, with the exception of the President of the Republic himself, were M. de Casabianca, the Minister of State, General Roguet, side-de-camp to Louis Napoleon, Count Bascecochi and Captain Excelmans, the officier d'ordonnance in waiting. The following are the names of the English guests:—The Marquis of Bath, the Marquis of Hertford, the Marquis and Marchioness of Douglas, Lord and Lady Ernest Bruce, Lord and Lady Frederick Gordon Hallyburton, Lord and Lady Pettimore, Lord Adolphus Fitzclarence, Viscount Ranelagh, Lord Alfred Churchill, Mr. and Lady Mary Christopher, Mr. and Mrs. Baillie Cochrane, the Hon. Spencer Cowper, Viscount Clifden, Mr. Henry Barnng, Baroness Delmar, Mr. and Mrs. Cavendish, Sir Henry and Lady Ellis, the Hon. George Stafford Jerningham, the Hon. William Stuart, Mr. Augustus Paget, Mr. Corbett, Mr. and Mrs. Clark, Lady Farquhar and Miss Farquhar, Miss Stewart Mackenzie, of Seaforth; Mr. and Mrs E. Blount, and the two Misses Kennedy Erskine. The banquet was a pendant to the decree restoring titles of nobility which had been abolished by the Provisional Government.

The whole party consisted of forty-three. The entertainment was presented in a style of great splendour, dinner having been served in the great dining-room of the Palace. The plate (the whole of which was of massive gold) was the same which was used in former days at the principal receptions at the Tuileries

In the course of the evening Louis Napoleon expressed great regret that the belief of his warlike intentions against England should have become so prevalent in that country. He declared that nothing was farther from his thoughts than to make war with that country. It was a country in which he had lived long enough to acquire not only a respect for its people, but respect for its institutions; and he still had a great many friends there. As to the rumour that he intended to make war against England, he declared that it was simply absurd.

The honours of the Palace were done by Louis Napoleon's cousin, the Marchioness of Douglas, whom the President handed in to dinner.

Prince Lucien Murat, who has been appointed Vice-President of the Senate, is to have the Palace of the Little Luxembourg as his official residence in Paris. the Palace of Meudon as his country residence, and a salary (it is said) of 150,000f, besides 800,000f for entertaining, for a year. The Vice President of the Senate (M. Mesnard) and General d'Hautpoul, the grand referendaire, are to have apartments in the Palace of the Luxembourg, with salaries of 60,000f. each.

M. Proudhon is to be discharged from the prison of St. Pélagie in a few days, as his condemnation to three years' imprisonment, pronounced at the commencement of 1849, is on the point of expiring. The author of "La Propriété, c'est le Vol," underwent the first part of his punishment at the Conciergerie. On various occasions he obtained permission to leave the prisons for brief periods, particularly when about to be married. Lately, also, he was allowed to go out to visit his wife when ill

SPAIN.—ATTACK ON QUEEN ISABELLA.

A telegraphic despatch from Madrid, vid Paris, of the 2d inst, states that an attempt has been made on the life of the Queen, but the wound is not dangerous The Queen was going to church at the time. The assassin fired with a pistol, and the shot struck the Queen's shoulder. He has been arrested.

DENMARK.

There had been a ministerial crisis in Copenhagen, which had ended in the formation of a new Cabinet. In the setting of the Landsthing and the Volksthing (the two Chambers of Denmark), on the 26th ult., the definitive formation of the new Ministry was announced. Councilor Blulme, General Haussen, Commodore Steen-Bille, and Count Sponneck take the command of Foreign Affairs, War, Marine, and Finance for all the Monarchy. Count Charles Moltke is appointed Minister for the Duchy of Schleswig, and Count Reventlow Criminal Minister for the Duchies of Holstein and Luxemburg. In the same sitting a Royal proclamation, setting forth the functions of the different governmental departments, establishing a separate administration for the Duchies, and other matters of detail, was read

UNITED STATES.

The accounts this week from New York are to the 24th ult.

The position of the disagreement between the Austrian representative at Washington and the United States, relative to Mr. Webster's speech at the Kossuth Congressional banquet, has not been changed in any respect of importance. Chevalier Hulsemann has addressed a second letter to the President on the subject, in which he explicit y stated that if the sentiments of Mr. Webster, encouraging a part of the Austrian empire to rebellion, were endorsed by the President, the only alternative for the Austrian Minister would be to quit the country. The President invited M. Hulsemann to a confidential conversation, which was accepted. M. Hulsemann was then informed that the views of the executive were expressed in the annual Message to Congress, and in the President's reply to Kossuth's address on his arrival at the White House; that the Executive did not indorse the speech of Mr. Webster. With this explanation Chevalier Hulsemann expressed himself satisfied, provided he might be permitted the privilege of reducing the facts of the conversation to writing, for the information of his Government. The President consented, and thus the matter stands

Kossuth and suite arrived at Pittsburgh on the evening of the 22d ult. in sleighs. He was in ill health.

In Congress the Message of Mormon revelations had created considerable discussion, which it is expected may lead to some curious revelations as to the social state of that sect

In the Senate, on the 21st, several messages were received from the President, among them one communicating the correspondence between the United States Minister at Paris and the State department relative to Louis Napoleon's coup d'etat. Mr. Rives stated, in firm language, his condemnation of Louis Napoleon's conduct, and stated that he could not deem it consistent with We are glad to find, in the representative of the American Republic, to recognise by his presence what he characterised as an usurpation on the part of Louis Napoleon. Mr. Webster, in reply, approved of the Minister's hesitation, deplored the overthrow of the French Republic and finally advised the recognition of the present state of things in France.

President Filmore has been waited upon by large deputations from various cities in the Union, requesting his intercession with the British Government in behalf of Smith O'Brien and his companions in exile The President informed them that it would be extremely improper for him to interfere with the internal affairs of Great Britain; but that, so far as personal sympathy was concerned, he felt as deeply as they could for the exile.

The President is a candidate for re-election to the supreme office in the State.

The winter throughout the States was much more severe than had been experienced for many years. At New York there was a solid bridge of ice across the river, over which persons were able to pass, and the ferry-boats had to cease plying. At New Orleans the weather was stated to be the coldest known for thirty years. At Philadelphia, on the 21st, the steam-ship City of Manchester, from Liverpool, attempted to come up, but to return to the breakwater, the ice blocking her passage up the river. The Bay of Chesapeake was blocked up with ice, some parts closed, and people were passing from the eastern and western shores. The ship Flora M'Donald, with 300 passengers, became fixed in the ice off Poplar Island, and with only one day's provisions: it was deemed in a dangerous position.

From Mexico we have Vera Cruz advices to the 4th ult., which report that the disturbances which had occurred in the cities of Mexico and Puebla, and other places, had been easily suppressed, and that the country was in a comparatively quiet state. From Rio Grande the accounts are to the 6th ult., and state that Caravajal had received reinforcements, and contemplated another attack on Matamoras. General Avolvas had an army of 2600 men in the field ready to oppose him.

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

The latest intelligence from the Cape is dated the 28th of December. It announces little or no change of affairs at the seat of war. The expedition beyond the Kei had made no further progress, and, in consequence of the continued heavy rains, it was expected that the troops would have to return and recruit before they could attempt any active measures against the enemy

Under date December 20, we learn from Graham's [illegible] that when Colonel Eyre's division crossed the Kei a large force of K[illegible] Bomboo kaffirs was concealed in a kloof, and fired on the troops A party of our cavalry went through a [illegible] drift, and, taking the enemy in the rear, killed thirty five in that place.

A project for the abandonment of the Orange River sovereignty had been mooted, and had given great dissatisfaction to the colonists, who allege that the abandonment of the land would not secure peace, but would be an encouragement to the turbulence of the Kaffirs, and make Colesburg, and even Grahamstown, as accessible to savage inroads from the north as Albany and Uitenage are now from the east.

INDIA.

The despatches which were anticipated by electric telegraph last week have been since received, but they add little to the intelligence then given. The dates are, Bombay, January 3, and Calcutta, December 26. From Peshawur we learn that the force under Brigadier Campbell has done little of late. The north-west frontier is, however, in a most excited state, and, according to the Bombay Times, the hill tribes around Peshawur and in the neighbourhood of the Hazareh country have united for resistance and retaliation against us; and, if common report is to be credited, Saadut Khan has succeeded in assembling a large body of Mohmunds, numbering at the lowest estimate six thousand men, under him. From the Hazareh country we learn of the butchery of two British officers, Messrs. Carne and Tapp, by a body of Mohmunds, near a place called Moozuffurgurh.

The Governor-General was expected at Calcutta on the 20th of Jan.; he was at Shahjehanpore on the 20th of December.

Lord Stanley, who is travelling in India, is at present at Madras.

The death of Lieutenant-Colonel Drummond, C.B., quarter-master-general of the Bengal army, is announced. He died at head-quarters camp at Khairian, near Jeelum, on the 11th of December. He had been forty-three years in the service.

COUNTRY NEWS.

ART MANUFACTURES INSTITUTE AT BRADFORD.—Two meetings, convened by the Mayor of Bradford upon a requisition signed by about fifty of the principal manufacturers of the borough, were held in the Mechanics' Institute on Monday, for the purpose of hearing and considering the views and explanatory statements of a deputation from the council of the Society of Arts with reference to a proposal for the establishment of artisans' drawing and modelling schools. The deputation included Sir Charles Pasley, Mr. Henry Cole, C.B., Mr. Owen Jones, Mr. Papp, Mr. Creswick, R.A., and Mr. John Bell. One of the meetings was held at three in the afternoon, and the other in the evening. The mayor presided on both occasions, and a large number of the Aldermen and Town Council of the borough, the members of the Chamber of Commerce, the Rev. Incumbent, M. P., and other gentlemen of advantages arising from the establishment of these schools; and several other gentlemen having followed in the same strain, a series of resolutions was ultimately adopted, recognising the great advantages derivable from a self-supporting institution such as that explained by Mr. Cole, as calculated to improve the art applied to the manufactures of Bradford and its neighbourhood, and the general taste of all classes. A committee, consisting of a number of the most wealthy and influential residents in the town, was appointed to carry out the proposed object, and a list of shareholders was at once opened. The committee were authorised at once to arrange for the establishment of self-supporting drawing-schools throughout the district. Thanks were voted to the deputation and the Mayor at the termination of each meeting.

THE BRIGHTON SCHOOL.—On the 28th ult., an interesting ceremonial, in connexion with the cause of education, took place at the inauguration of the spacious new premises lately erected for the Brighton School, at the Clifton-road, Brighton. The proprietor of this excellent educational establishment for young gentlemen, Mr. Winter, three years ago commenced a training institution, which was soon found inadequate to accommodate the number of pupils entrusted to his charge; and hence the necessity for providing the commodious and e-gant range of buildings whose opening was celebrated by the festival of the 28th ult. The company, consisting of the friends and parents of the pupils, assembled in the lecture-hall of the school, where the Rev. Joseph Sortain delivered an appropriate address; after which a handsome piece of plate, subscribed for by the pupils and masters of the establishment, was presented to Mr. Winter as a testimonial of their respect for his high character and affectionate bearing. Mr. Winter made a very feeling reply, and the National Anthem having been sung, the clergy and friends were conducted through the school premises, and after an inspection of the class-rooms, dormitories, &c., expressed themselves highly gratified with the arrangements of the institution. A déjeuner followed in the dining-hall of the school.

THE VOLUNTARY PRINCIPLE OF EDUCATION.—The friends of voluntary and religious education concluded their conferences at Manchester on Tuesday evening, and afterwards had a great public meeting in the Free-trade Hall. Mr. James Sidebottom presided; and the meeting was addressed by the Rev. George Smale, the Rev. J. H. Hinton, and Mr. G. W. Alexander, London; Mr. Edward Baines, Leeds; Rev. J. E. Giles, Sheffield; Rev. R. Parsons, Leeds; Rev. Dr. Raleigh, Manchester; and Rev. Dr. Acworth, Bristol. The first resolution avowed that the meeting entertained a high sense of the importance of education, and cordially elded to none in readiness to adopt and encourage any method which could be legitimately employed for its more general diffusion. The next resolution was—"That, without regarding in a captious spirit the schemes proposed by the National Public School Association on the one hand, or the Manchester and Salford School committee on the other, as undeserving the promoters of them the praise due to upright and benevolent intentions, this meeting cannot but entertain strong and decided objections to them both. To the former they have the insuperable objection that it is supported by the very worst element in education—from the school routine, and abandons it to the caste-obstinate teaching. To the latter, they think it an objection not less insuperable that it extends equal patronage to religious sects—not only of adverse, but of contradictory forms. And to both they hold it as an axiom in common, that they avail themselves of public taxation for an object which, whether religious he or be not included in it, is not the function of any Government, nor properly within the sphere of legislation." One of the speakers said the money sunk in free schools in England at this moment was fifteen millions sterling; and so great was the perversion of the whole places from their original design that only 400 scholars in them all received a thorough free education. The proceedings lasted four hours and a half.

SIR JOHN BOROUGH.—A requisition signed by the Roman Catholic Bishop, the Mayor, and a majority of the electors has been forwarded to Charles Towne-ley, of Towneley, Esq., requesting him to stand at the next election. It is supposed that Mr. Towneley will consent; and, if so, no doubt appears to be entertained of his return in the room of the present member, Mr. J. P. Somes.

PORTLAND BREAKWATER, 1852.—The works are making very favourable progress, and even now afford a very great and secure shelter to the numerous shipping which take shelter in the bay. The works are carried out to a distance of 7750 feet from the original line of shore into about 9½ fathoms of water.

GLASGOW CHESS CLUB, AND READING AND BERKSHIRE CHESS CLUB.—We are glad to find, in the reports of the annual meetings of these two societies, that each may be considered successful and consolidated. The number who accepted the challenge of members to the Glasgow Chess Club since February last amounted to 139; and the the number of members enrolled at the Berkshire Club last year was not less than 80.

THE "AMAZON."—At a meeting of the Portsmouth Borough Council, on Monday, it was resolved that a letter of thanks be transmitted to the French Vice-Admiral at Brest, for the humanity and sympathy evinced by him in so prompt y dispatching a steamer to the assistance of the unfortunate passengers and crew of the ill-fated Amazon. On Tuesday the inquiry into the circumstances connected with the loss of this vessel, which has been going on for some days, was brought to a conclusion. Captain Chappell's testimony went to show that the Amazon left Southampton in most excellent condition, and with a most efficient crew. Evidence respecting provisions, water, &c., was also given, however, yet to be taken before the report to be sent to the Board of Trade is made.

CURIOUS CASE OF FORGERY.—A young man named John Burton was examined at the Liverpool Police-court on Wednesday on the charge of forging an acceptance to a bill of exchange for £191. The prisoner represented himself as having been engaged in the malting business. In August last he was in Denbigh, North Wales, where he purchased two horses. He appears to have had some transactions with an innkeeper of the town, Mr Edwin Hughes, who, on one occasion, he observes, to place some money in a cash box. In a few minutes after this he proceeded to give Mr. Hughes £10 for the cash-box with its contents, whatever might be the amount. Mr. Hughes assented, and the cash-box was handed over to Burton. There proved to be within the box between £6 and £7 in cash and some memoranda, among which was a bill drawn by Manders and Co., porter-brewers, of Dublin, on Mr. Edwin Hughes, for £191. The bill was, however, not accepted. About five o'clock on the afternoon of the day Burton called upon Mr. Ashe, spirit merchant, of South Castle-street, Liverpool, to whom he presented the bill to be cashed, but he was told it was not accepted, and therefore not negotiable. At the same time he accepted bill was drawn by him, as he appeared ignorant of the required form. Two hours after this Burton presented the same bill, now purporting to be accepted by Jonathan Hughes, of Denbigh, to Mr. Roberts, tea-dealer, Royal Bank-buildings. The account he then gave of himself created Mr. Roberts's suspicion, and he was handed over to the police. On Wednesday Mr. Jonathan Hughes, who is the father of the original possessor of the cash-box, proved that the acceptance was not executed by him, as it appeared to be. Burton was therefore committed for trial.

FIRES IN CUMBERLAND.—In consequence of the heavy falls of rain [illegible] Monday in the neighbourhood of Carlisle, the river Eden and all its tributaries have swollen to an extent beyond the recollection of any living person, and it is feared the largest damage has been done to adjoining property.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

AUGMENTATION OF THE ARMY.—In conformity with the final determination of the Government to increase the number of men in the regiments of the line to the extent of 5000 men, instructions have been forwarded from the Horse Guards to different corps to send recruiting parties immediately to different parts of the country, particularly Ireland. The mode of augmentation will be by raising the strength of regiments from 750 to 1000. It is expected that, when the army estimates for 1852-3 are brought before Parliament this session, a vote will be asked for of 5000 men additional to be added to the Royal Artillery and Cavalry Regiments. The recruiting parties have been already very successful in Limerick, Cornet, Nenagh, and generally in Munster, where few have appeared. In some places, many ragged labourers, who had availed themselves of the union workhouses as a temporary refuge, have gladly enlisted. The peasantry exhibit still more alacrity than in former years to adopt a military life. Notwithstanding the great decrease of the population, from famine and emigration, there will be no difficulty in obtaining the required addition to the army, or even a much larger augmentation, if needed.

THE VACANT COLONELCIES.—The colonelcy of the 39th Regiment has been vacant since the 1st of January; since then that of the 96th is also vacated. It is still believed that Major-General Conyers will succeed to the 39th Regiment.

ROYAL ARTILLERY.—The experiments hitherto carried on with a less charge of powder when firing 32-pounder shells have proved so satisfactory, that the following has just been issued.—

"GENERAL ORDER.

"Deputy Adjutant-General's office, Woolwich, Jan. 29, 1852.

"The Master-General and Board having, on the recommendation of the select committee, directed that the higher charge of powder for firing 32-pounder shells with ever description of fuze shall in future be 8 lb., instead of 6 lb., as at present, the same is notified for the guidance of the Royal Regiment of Artillery. "H. D. Ross, Deputy Adjutant-General."

CAPE STAFF.—First Lieutenant Greville, of the 2d battalion 60th Rifles, is appointed an aide-de-camp to the new Cape Governor, Major-General Cathcart.

WOOLWICH.—ROYAL ARSENAL.—Fifteen thousand shells have been ordered, to be immediately packed ready for service, and sent away to the different ports throughout England. A still larger order is daily expected: many of the men work overtime, and additional men and boys to be entered to complete the supply required. Some engineers, fitters, &c. are to be entered to complete the orders just received for machinery, &c. Large orders for powder bags have been received, and on Saturday last a large quantity was sent away. An order is expected for 5000 guns more. A member of the engineers "on strike" have applied for employment in the Arsenal

NEW GUNS FOR THE SERVICE.—There have lately been despatched for the Cape 320 new double carabines, which are nearly one-third lighter than is necessary. They are bored at the side of the chamber, by a square, nearly long communication with the charge, and with the left cock so far away as to simplify a very large hand. In consequence of these defects in this new arm, Colonel Hawker sent to Messrs. Tipping and Lawden, of Birmingham, the model for his carabine on a better principle, and which weighs under 7 lb., instead of 8 lb. as usual. It is ignited by putting the seat for the nipple on the centre instead of at the side of each barrel. This carabine is the just now received, and taken to the Ordnance. Colonel Hawker advises that all the new muskets should be bored in this way, so near, at least, as the life of aim on a single barrel will admit of, by which means the locks bent inwards (like the French ones), as the angles produced by what he calls the "Enfield bunion" are only receptacles for caustic fluid and rust, liable to choke up, to shoot slowly, and to miss fire in actual service. He recommends servula to all the lock springs, and the use of larger-grained powder; also that the conical ball shall not exceed the weight of the present ball, by which the arms might be made lighter and with a smaller calibre.

FLENCH ARMY HORSES.—The following are the official prices fixed by the Minister of War for horses and other quadrupeds for the service in the army Horses for the reserve, 800f.; for the line, 950f.; for the light cavalry, 1,000f.; do. for Africa, 350f.; for artillery and waggon train, 600f.; draught horses, 850f.; trained horses for the military schools, 1000f.; officers' horses, 1,500f.; mules, 500f.; donkeys, 200f.; camels and dromedaries, 200f.—Galignani.

MILITARY LEGACY.—Captain John Stanley, of Prescot, Lancashire, has bequeathed for the use of her Majesty's Royal Military College at Chelsea upwards of £1800.

Rear-Admiral J. B. Reynolds, C.B., ex-Commander-in-Chief from the Boards, having succeeded to the flag-lieutenancy at the ensuing dock-vacancy, the Admiralty have promoted Lieutenant Fred. Wood-combe (1840) to the rank of Commander

Messrs. Fox, Henderson, and Co. have just completed machines for boring guns upon the Lancastrian principle. A piece is now undergoing the process, and, if it is found to answer, in all probability a large number will be made at the establishment. They are also about to contract for manufacturing an improved shell. It is of an oblong shape, about two feet long, with a spring at the end communicating with a cap near the middle of the shell, and beneath the improvement.

It is now stated to be in contemplation to place the other Dragoon Guards upon the same footing as the 1st Dragoons, the regiments are said to have eight troops each. Six of the regiments of Light Cavalry will, it is understood, be armed as the rifle carabine. Four regiments of the same will, in all probability, be selected as rifle corps; and the light companies of all the regiments are also to be armed with the rifle—a necessary measure, as all our Light Corps are now in India, the Cape, and Canada.

In consequence of the continued distress in the Highlands of Scotland, the Admiralty have countermanded their order for the Conway to proceed to return to Cork. She is to remain at the disposal of Sir John M'Neil and the relief committee.

On Tuesday a return to Parliament was printed showing the condition of the coast-guard service for the last ten years. In 1841 there were 50 cutters and 31 tenders. The mounted guard was 1426, and the total force numbered 5044, and the expense was £268,282 2s. 7d. In 1851 there were 18 cutters and one tender The mounted guard was only 14, and the force 3[illegible] the expense was reduced to £160,963 19s. 6d

Twenty-five first-class boys left the Figard flag-ship at Woolwich, for Portsmouth, on Monday, to join the Britannia, 120, screw, flag-ship of Rear-Admiral J. W. D. Dundas, C.B., for the Mediterranean station. These boys were raised on board the Figard flag-ship at Woolwich, having been selected to serve as first class boys from a great number of applicants made on Monday afternoon.

THE "ORINOCO" STEAM-SHIP.

THIS splendid steam-ship, recently built for the Royal Mail Company, left her moorings at Southampton on Monday afternoon, and proceeded on her voyage to Chagres. She carries about 80 passengers, the greater portion of whom are gentlemen. There are besides on board a company of Cornish miners, sent out under the auspices of the Ave Maria Gold Company to Chagres, en route to California by the Isthmus of Panama. She has a full cargo of Manchester and other goods, and a very large quantity of quicksilver and specie. Captain Chapman, who was to have commanded the unfortunate Amazon, has been selected to take charge of the Orinoco. She is manned with a fine set of officers and crew.

The Orinoco is of 2300 tons burthen. She was built by Mr. W. Pitcher, of Northfleet, and left Blackwall on Friday, the 23d ult, for the trial of her machinery, &c. Her engines, which are of the direct-acting power, 500 horses, have been manufactured by the eminent firm of Maudslay, Sons, and Field, upon their patent double-cylinder principle. The paddle-wheels are by Pitcher, and fitted with patent feathering floats. The construction of the machinery was pronounced by the judges on board to be perfect in every respect, and the whole of the arrangements connected with the engine-room were the theme of general admiration.

The figure-head, sculptured by R. Hall, of Rotherhithe, is spirited and characteristic.

A peculiar interest appeared to attach itself to this vessel in the minds of every one on board, from the recollection of the calamity that has so recently befallen the unfortunate Amazon. Attention was almost immediately attracted to the manner in which the life-boats were secured, so much having been said and written on the subject of the iron cranes that were fitted to the Amazon. The plan adopted on board the Orinoco was much admired for its extreme simplicity and efficacy: it consists of two wooden chocks or wedges placed on the top of the deck-house, and supporting the boat's keel from opposite sides, in the manner shown in the accompanying Sketch. To one of the wedges a small line is attached, the other end of which is made fast inboard; by means of this line the wedge can be withdrawn, and the boat is then free to be swung off without interruption.

During the passage down the Channel an experiment was made to ascertain how quickly the boats could be cut loose and got clear of the sponsons. The operation was performed in less than three minutes from the sound of the men being called on, but without previous notice being given to them. The pumps were next looked at with much interest; and it was observed with satisfaction, that, in addition to the fire-pump fitted between decks, as in the Amazon, the Orinoco carries another powerful force-pump on her spar-deck, which can be made use of at times when the other might be unavailable. On reaching Gravesend, as it was evident that the machinery was all in perfect order, not an hour's detention was necessary; and, accordingly, the vessel at once proceeded to try her seaworthiness in a trip to Southampton. A number of gentlemen who had started with the intention of witnessing only her performance in the river now also decided on going round with the vessel, having little idea of the buffeting they were to meet with before reaching their destination. After passing the Foreland, the Orinoco encountered one of the severest gales that has been known in the Channel for many years: it lasted several hours, but the good ship held her way, and reached Southampton on Sunday, shortly after noon having perfectly satisfied every person on board that a safer or an easier sea boat could not be met with, and that she may be reckoned as possessing the highest combination of the unrivalled skill in naval architecture and engineering in which this country excels. The average speed of the vessel through the water, as tested by several runs at the measured mile in Stokes Bay, was proved to be 12 040 knots per hour; the engines making 13¾ revolutions per minute, with 12 lb. steam.

The dimensions of the Orinoco are as follows:—

The accompanying Engraving shows the plan of the chock and wedge for sustaining the weight of the life-boats when stowed on the deck-houses.

WRECK OF THE "AMAZON."

Portions of the wreck of this ill-fated vessel continue to be found. The Illustration shows some remains which were washed ashore a few days since at Swanpool (about a mile from Falmouth), and were placed in the possession of R. R. Broad, Esq., Lloyd's agent. This portion consists of five stanchions and six planks, secured together as a bulkhead, and having a number of large spike nails in it, to one of which was attached a piece of lace, such as is used for ladies' caps. The length is 21 feet; width, 6½ feet; stanchions 9 inches by 5 inches. The timber is red pine, not painted on either side. One end of the stanchions and the upper part of one side are quite burnt through. In the distance of the Sketch are shown Pendennis Castle and St. Anthony Lighthouse.

RUGBY WATER SUPPLY AND DRAINAGE WORKS.

On Saturday the new works of water supply and drainage for the sanitar improvement of the town of Rugby were inspected by the Commissioners of the General Board of Health. The Earl of Shaftesbury, Mr. Chadwick, and Dr. Southwood Smith, attended by some officers of the General Board, arrived shortly after noon. They were received by the chairman and the members of the local board, who accompanied them over the main works, which are now just completed. The most conspicuous work is a high water-tower, containing a large tank of a capacity sufficient to give a supply to the town during the Sunday, or in case of fire, or in the night; and intended to give pressure in the distribution of the water, and to avoid the necessity for continuous pumping. This tower, tastefully built in the Italian style, in various-coloured glazed bricks, manufactured by a new process, is in itself a pleasing feature in the town. The next work inspected was an underground reservoir, covered with groined arches, into which the party descended, when the water was admitted in full orce. The following is the explanation given in the course of the inspection as to the peculiar mode of collecting the water. The tab e area consists of a bed of gravel and loam, resting upon a substratum of clay, which, being impermeable, prevents the further downward passage of the rainfall readily received into the porous upper medium, which consequently became charged with water. Deep drains have been cut into the gravel, by the operation of which the water has been liberated, and such is the arrangement, that it may be drawn off at will, as from an ordinary storage reservoir, for the supply of the town. It is delivered from the drains cool and clear, as if issuing from perennial springs. The property of the water, in respect of hardness, was said to be equal to eight degrees, while that of the existing town wa.s varies from 15 to 20 and even 30 degrees, and that of the streams in the neighbourhood is generally of 18 degrees. The drainage works were afterwards inspected. The sewers, it appears, are entirely of impermeable stoneware tubes, and the main lines, which converge upon a single distant outfall into the Avon, are laid at a depth to drain the basement of every house.

The total charges to be levied on account of the new works, in the nature of special district rates and water-rate, it was said, will be 1d. in the pound annually; that is to say, upon a house of £5 rental the charge will be 5s. 5d. a year, or 1¾d. a week; upon a house of £10 rental, 10s. 10d. a year, or 2¼d. a week; and upon a house of £20 rental, £1 1s. 8d. a year, or 5d. per week. The average charge per house will be 19s. a year, or 4¼d. a week; and the average charge per head of population, 3s. 3d. a year, or ¾d. a week. It was stated, that in the case of Rugby, owing to the absence of natural advantages, both the works of water supply and of drainage had been more expensive than would be the case in towns of similar size under ordinary circumstances. The water supply was rendered unusually costly by reason of there being no elevated ground in the neighbourhood on which to construct a service reservoir, and the consequent necessity for building a tower, and by the artificial means which had to be resorted to to obtain water of pure quality. The drainage works were expensive on account of the distance of the outfall, and the great length of circuit which the drains had to take in order to accumulate at the sewage upon that one point. The works have been laid out on a scale to meet a very considerable increase in the size of the place; and it was said, that, with a very slight additional expenditure, they would serve for double the present population.

THE RIGHT HON. THE EARL OF ALBEMARLE,

MOVER OF THE ADDRESS IN THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

LIEUT.-COLONEL GEORGE THOMAS KEPPEL, sixth Earl of ALBEMARLE, third son of William Charles, fourth Earl, by Elizabeth, fourth daughter of Edward, twentieth Lord de Clifford, was born in London, June 13th, 1799; at a very early age was sent to Westminster School; entered the army, in the 14th Foot, in April, 1815, and was present at the battle of Waterloo. He served in the Mediterranean in 1816 and 1817; in the Isle of France in 1818 and 1819; and for the three following years in India, as aide-de-camp to the Marquis of Hastings, then Governor-General.

In 1824 he made an overland journey to England, by way of Babylon, and along the western shores of the Caspian Sea. His object was not speed, but observation. He spent a year on the way, and published (at Colburn's), on his arrival in England, an account of his route, which rapidly attained popularity, and ran through several editions.

In 1825 he was appointed Aide-de-Camp to the Marquis Wellesley, then Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, an appointment which he held until the close of 1827.

In 1829 he again set out to travel; spent that and the following year in Europe and Asiatic Turkey, and, returning in 1831, published, at Bentley's, the journey across the Balkan, which, like the former work, had a rapid sale, and saw several editions.

But his Lordship did not devote himself exclusively to travel and literary pursuits. At the great Reform Bill election, in 1832, he came forward as a candidate with Mr. Wyndham, and in opposition to Mr. Peach and Lord Cholmondeley, for East Norfolk, and, after a hot contest, was returned. At the general election in 1837 he contested Lynn, and was defeated; and in 1841 was an unsuccessful candidate for Lymington.

In 1838 he was appointed Groom in Waiting to the Queen; and in 1841, by the brevet on the occasion of the birth of the Prince of Wales, obtained the rank of Lieutenant-Colonel

In 1846 he was appointed private secretary to Lord John Russell. At the general election in 1847 was returned for Lymington; and on March 15, 1851, succeeded his brother in the peerage.

In the present year his Lordship has published at Bentley's, in two volumes octavo. "Memoirs of the Marquis of Rockingham," in the collection of the materials for which he has spent, and spent well (for the book cannot fail to become a political classic), a large amount of time and labour. The work consists chiefly of the papers of Lord Rockingham himself, connected by such clear commentary and details of fact as to lay bare before us every party plot and court intrigue of the eventful period of which it treats.

The book opens with the first day of the reign, and the first speech from the throne, of George the Third; traces the literal break-up and out of office of Pitt and his section of the Whig party, by the King; the continuance in power of the Tories by submission to the Royal will, until they were forced from office by popular rebuke; the steady formation of a third Whig party round the Marquis of Rockingham as leader, and the advent of this party to power. To this party, but sorely against his will, and with the innate resolve that at any cost it should be but for a brief period, the necessities of the State compelled the King to entrust the formation of a Government, and in the June of 1765 the Marquis of Rockingham became Prime Minister. His tenure of office was brief; for not only the ordinary array of parties, but most perseveringly the utmost power of the Throne, was exerted against him. The Ministry remained in office but a year; but that year shines out in all that period as one of thorough earnest honesty of purpose; showing how much, even then, might have been accomplished, had there been in any other party a like regard for the public good, and abhorrence of party servility.

During the Rockingham year the Stamp Act was repealed, the popularity of the mother country to a considerable extent restored in the American colonies, the illegality of general warrants established, the seizure of papers in cases of libel put an end to, and the practice of removing officers from the army for their votes in Parliament abolished.

In the July of 1766, this Ministry, too independent for the King, went out of office. Sixteen years afterwards the Marquis of Rockingham was again called to the head of affairs. He took office on the 30th of March, and died on the 1st of July: but even the three months were not without useful work; he established order in Ireland, and set to work upon financial reform in right earnest, by proposing to get rid of a swarm of highly-paid but utterly useless Government employés. If in to these two periods of office, separated by so long an interval, and both so brief, that Lord Albemarle has addressed himself. He brings to ward the subject of his volumes neither as a miracle of statesmanship, nor as the possessor of any mysterious power of speech, but in proof how much a thoroughly honestly-minded man in power may accomplish. The Marquis of Rockingham, says Horace Walpole, was a statesman in whom constancy, fidelity, sincerity, and directness were the sole instruments of his policy. His virtues were his arts. In opposition he respected the principles of government—in administration he provided for the liberties of the people. He employed his moments of power in realising everything which he had proposed in a popular situation."

It is but needful to read these volumes to be compelled to prefer such statesmanship, in its plain, every-day, common, business-like honesty, to the cleverest management of parties, and the nicest balancing of what should be in justice done for the people with what may just serve for the day to stay the progress of agitation. Lord Albemarle has assuredly, by the publication of these memoirs, "done the state some service" by showing that in all statesmanship there is no cunning mystery of policy can cope for genuine usefulness and future fame with honesty.

We have been tempted by the high political moral of these volumes to wander a little from our direct memoir. But to return. The family of Lord Albemarle is of old and continuous distinction. The first who attracts notice in one Walter Van Keppel, Lord of Keppel, a town on the banks of the Yssel, in Guelderland He owned a stronghold there, and was founder of a monastery so long back as the year 1179; and his predecessors are traceable for some seventy or eighty years before that, as Knights of Jerusalem. From this earliest time down to the migration of the Keppels to England in the person of Arnold Joost Van Keppel, Lord of Voorst, under William of Orange, in 1618, it seems that they maintained their importance in their own land; for from the first establishment of the Netherlands as a Republic they are recorded as men of mark in the deliberations of the Assembly of Nobles.

Nor did this stirring spirit die out of them by being transplanted. Vooral Van Keppel became the prime favourite of the King, and was speedily created Baron Ashford, Viscount Bury, and Earl of Albemarle. His son, by the time he was twenty-five, had distinguished himself in the army, and was Governor of Virginia. He commanded the front line of the army at the battle of Culloden; and in 1748 was sent as Ambassador to Paris. This Governor Keppel's second son, Augustus, who had fourteen brothers and sisters, sailed with Anson round the world, starting at the very time that Smollett sailed with the expedition to Carthagena, on which he picked up the facts for his "Roderick Random." The life of this Admiral Keppel—who after various daring exploits, dangers, and victories, came to be First Lord of the Admiralty under the last administration of the Marquis of Rockingham, in 1782, and directly after Viscount Keppel—has been ably written, and was published at Culloden's, in 1842, by the Hon. and Rev. Thomas Keppel, brother of the present Lord Albemarle, and who was himself, in early life, in the navy. The Admiral died in 1786, and his Peerage expired.

George, third Earl, served at the battle of Fontenoy, in 1745, and, next year, was sent to London of the deadliest foes Culloden, announcing the victory, and was subsequently Commander-in-Chief at Havannah. The fourth Earl, his son, died in 1817.

The present Earl married, in 1831, Susan, daughter of Sir Coutts Trotter, Bart.

In moving the Address, his Lordship touched upon the calm which during every convulsion abroad during the last four years this country had enjoyed. It was, therefore, not to be wondered at that we should feel a pride in our system of government; but we were not, therefore, to deny that every nation had a right to whatever form of constitution it might please. There was no such thing, though the phrase was of old common enough, as a natural enemy. The Exhibition of last year proved the natural dependence of nations. He had spoken the hostalities of Paris on the occasion of the visit of the Royal Commissioners, and had heard Lord Granville's speech, referring to the common interest of both nations in the permanence of peace between them, welcomed with enthusiasm; and in the course of travel afterwards he found that the enthusiasm had spread even to the interior of the Mediterranean. He, therefore, had perfect faith in the assurances of peace with foreign powers set forth in the Speech. He referred briefly to the state of affairs in Holstein, the Cape war, the condition of certain provinces in the north of Ireland, and dwelt upon the evidences of prosperity furnished by the increase of exports and imports, the improved comfort and health of the people, as evidenced by the sanitary returns and the diminished poor-rates, and the increased demand for tea, sugar, and other articles of ordinary consumption. As to the proposed measure of reform, he but asked that if it came before their Lordships it should meet their calm and unprejudiced consideration.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE LORD LEIGH.

SECONDER OF THE ADDRESS IN THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

William Henry Baron Leigh, son of the first Baron Chandos Leigh, by the eldest daughter of the Rev. Shippan Wills, of Astrop House, Northamptonshire, was born January 19th, 1824, at Adlestrop House, Gloucestershire; in 1838 was sent to Harrow, and in 1843 entered Trinity College, Cambridge, and, leaving it about the end of 1845, travelled over Europe and in the East, and having made some stay at Constantinople, returned to England in the beginning of 1847, and at the general election in that year came forward as a candidate for North Warwickshire, in the Free-trade and Liberal interest, in opposition to Messrs. Spooner and Newdegate; and although his opponents had been for several weeks in the field, and his Lordship came forward only on the day of nomination, he had, therefore, the honour of the prosperity furnished by the increase of exports and imports, the improved comfort and health of the people, as evidenced by the sanitary returns and the diminished poor-rates, and the increased demand for tea, sugar, and other articles of ordinary consumption. As to the proposed measure of reform, he but asked that if it came before their Lordships it should meet their calm and unprejudiced consideration.

SIR RICHARD BULKELEY WILLIAMS BULKELEY, BART., M.P. FOR ANGLESEA, MOVER OF THE ADDRESS IN THE COMMONS.

The honourable Member for Anglesea, eldest son of the tenth Baronet was born at London in the parish of Marylebone, in 1801. In 1830 he entered Parliament for Beaumaris, which he continued to represent until the Reform election of 1833, when he was returned for Anglesea. At the general election on the death of William IV., in 1837, he was an unsuccessful candidate for the same place, but was returned at the general election of 1841 for the Flint district, a seat which he retained until the general election of 1847, when he was elected for Anglesea without opposition. In 1847 he took the name of Bulkeley, and in 1851 was appointed Lord-Lieutenant of Carnarvonshire.

It is this twenty-two years since the hon member first came into the House. He has been, throughout, a constant supporter of the Liberal party; but, nevertheless, in moving the Address, made his maiden speech, in the course of which he said, that, during the period that he had been an active and independent member of the House, he had seen every most cherished institution of the country strengthened and extended, he had seen commercial monopolies extinguished and commerce enlarged, and never was the throne more secure and the country so great and prosperous as now. The Church revenues were better managed, its duties more strictly enforced, the number of churches increased, education had become something o: a system, and was fast extending. We had long enjoyed perfect peace with every European state and the material condition of the people was improved—the first and allimportant step to their moral advancement. These blessings he attributed to the sound policy of the Liberal Administration from the time of the introduction of the Reform Bill by Lord Grey; and, as a Reformer, he claimed for the noble Lord at the head of her Majesty's Government a large share of the merit of the happy changes to which were due our present prosperous position. To his unflinching advocacy and strong constitutional and liberal sympathies he ascribed the success of those measures which first extended the political rights and then improved the social condition of the people. With these facts before him, he was an uncompromising supporter of the Government. The hon. Member then dwelt upon the several heads of the Royal Speech. The wish of the people of this country was for peace. It was not possible we should not sympathise with the oppressed of every nation, and it was our duty to give, not merely asylum, but a welcome, to political refugees, spite of all remonstrance, from wherever they might come. We might advise and remonstrate with those Monarchs whom our blood and treasure had secured on their thrones: but we must go no further; we must have no armed intervention; we had had enough of war—wanted no addition to the debt, and were thoroughly tired of the income-tax. He looked, under the new Governor, and through the increased force placed in his charge, to the speedy settlement of affairs at the Cape, and trusted that then our troops would be withdrawn from the forts and garrisons, and the defence of the frontier be left to the settlers, who formerly had shown themselves will able to take care of themselves. It appeared preposterous to him that this nation, so large a landowner as it was, and commercial marine, twice in extent that of any country in the world, should dream of having its territory possessed by any nation upon earth, but, perhaps, the addition of a few thousand men to the army, and a fleet in the Channel, would be sufficient to allay the alarm of the present fears, and arrest the epidemic. He viewed as of the greatest moment the promised law reforms. During the last twenty years our criminal code had been greatly improved—punishment made milder, and convictions increased in proportion. The state of Ireland, he said, had been no change; that Court continued to be one of the great misfortunes of the country; in a single case connected with his own family, costs had amounted to £70,000; and, unless through Parliament, he saw no hope of relief. These results could never be accomplished. As to Free Trade, from the time of Huskisson down to the repeal of the Navigation Laws, he had heard prophecies of ruin, but now we had an increasing revenue, our people well employed, and peace and contentment throughout the land. In conclusion, he then referred to the mention of reform in the Royal Speech, declared that he was opposed to the ballot, opposed to triennial Parliaments, but in favour as a measure for the improvement of the people of a large extension of the franchise

The hon. member married, first, in 1828, Charlotte Mary, daughter of the first Lord Dinorben; and, secondly, in 1832, Maria Frances, daughter of Sir J. T. M. Stanley, Bart.

JOHN BONHAM CARTER, ESQ., M.P. FOR THE CITY OF WINCHESTER.

SECONDER OF THE ADDRESS IN THE COMMONS.

The honourable member—eldest son of the late John Bonham Carter, who from 1818 to 1832 represented Portsmouth in Parliament—was born on the 13th October, 1817. He received his preliminary education from a private tutor, in 1836 entered Trinity College, Cambridge, and subsequently studied for the bar, but was not called.

In 1841 he came forward as a candidate for the borough of Petersfield, but retired without going to a poll. In the following year he visited Norway, and has since travelled through the principal countries of Europe

At the general election of 1847 he was invited by requisition to contest Winchester, and in 1848 was appointed Deputy-Lieutenant of Hants. The candidates were Sir James East, Mr. Melville Portal, now M.P. for North Hampshire, and Bickham Escott, one of the ablest of the Peel party and one of the first of them that became a Free-trader. Mr. Portal retired almost immediately, and at the close of the poll the numbers were—Carter, 563; East, 313; Escott 245.

Previous to his seconding the Address the honourable member, except on matters of committee business, had not spoken in the House, but he has always been a consistent supporter of the Government, careful of the interests of his constituents, a diligent attender in the House, and has served in every session on important public and private committees, amongst which may be mentioned that on the Kaffir war, the Friendly Societies, and Turnpike Roads.

In seconding the Address, Mr. Bonham Carter dwelt upon the proofs of prosperity afforded by the facts of trade. The great national barometer was rising; the exports of the year showed an increase of nearly £3,000,000. Spite of the dismal auguries as to the Navigation Laws, our shipping had not failed: where, in 1843, we had two, we had now three ships; and every ship then of 100 tons was represented now by one of 130 tons The poor-law returns showed an improved condition of the people; but it was impossible to say one word on the subject of reform, and it was impossible to have been the content on so many thousand faces without rejoicing at the prosperity of the country. Such a period was the fitting time to consider an extension of the suffrage. He did not know the details of the proposed reform, but was glad to see it would be based on a large amount of intelligence at present excluded. The proofs of the fitness of the people for such extension were abundant The increase of letters by post from 75,000,000 per annum in 1832 to nearly a million a day, the number lately established of the institutions of the people, good publications, of which those of the Messrs Chambers alone amount to about 10,000,000 sheets per annum; the prodigious increase of books read in mechanics' institutes, the extension of friendly societies, the increased amount of deposits in the savings-banks, were some such evidences; and he trusted that, under the new measure, no class would be left in a position to show, that, being fitted to appreciate the trust, it was to remain without participation in the franchise.

Mr John Carter, grandfather of the honourable member, was knighted by George III., for his eminent services in preserving the public peace, at the time of the mutiny at Spithead, in 1793, and which he was enabled to do by the universal esteem in which he was held. His father was the leading Liberal of Portsmouth and the surrounding district for several years, and in the preparation and carriage of the Reform Bill through Parliament, was constantly consulted by the Government.

His maternal grandfather, Mr. W. Smith, for nearly forty years represented the city of Norwich, and was for several years the father of the House. The hon. member married, in 1848, Laura Maria, youngest daughter of George Thomas Nicholson, of Waverley Abbey, Surrey.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 7, 1852.

THE Government has given assurances of a desire not to let the grass grow under its feet in bringing forward the business of the present Session. On Monday next Lord John Russell is to move for leave to bring in a bill to extend the right of voting for members of Parliament, and to amend the laws relating to the representation of the people. On the Friday following his Lordship will move for leave to bring in a bill to amend the laws relating to the militia; on the same day the President of the Board of Trade will bring under the notice of Parliament the recent treaty of international copyright with France; and on Monday, the 16th instant, the Solicitor-General will bring forward a motion for the reform of the Court of Chancery; and Sir George Grey will move the disfranchisement of the notorious borough of St. Alban's. This seems like earnest, and the country will await with interest, but without anxiety, the further details upon all these important subjects which will forthwith be offered.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL is difficult to please. He has quarrelled with Lord Palmerston for approving of the coup d'état of Louis Napoleon; and on the night of the opening of Parliament he quarrelled with, or at all events reprimanded, the English press, for disapproving of it. What would his Lordship have? "Under which king, Bezonian?" In those times the Prime Minister of Great Britain should be a man who knows his own mind, and who, forming a clear idea of future events, should pursue a defined line of policy regarding them. But it seems to us that Lord John Russell, not alone in his quarrel with Lord Palmerston, but in his speech on the address, has shown himself to be somewhat confused, perplexed, and bewildered. At one moment he exhibits a courage, which might almost be called rashness, in ridding himself of his ablest and most popular colleague; and at another moment he manifests what we may not, perhaps, be justified in calling cowardice, but which looks very like it, in wishing to repress the freedom of discussion in this country, lest the unrestrained expression of opinion by the press upon the acts of the French President should precipitate a war between the two countries, or, as a minor evil, lead to ill-feeling between them. His Lordship is "convinced that there was no time when peace between Great Britain and France would more contribute to the cause of civilisation throughout the world than the present." In this conviction every sensible man participates. His Lordship, however, is equally convinced, "from assurances that he has had, that the present ruler of France is desirous of keeping on terms of amity with this country." In this comfortable belief his Lordship will not find so many to support him. The assurances of Louis Napoleon are not to be weighed by the natural meaning of his words. Whenever he finds it, or supposes it, to be his interest to employ his immense army in war, he will forget all his assurances—just as he forgot his oath to the Constitution of 1848. But whether or no, we would ask the Prime Minister whether England is not to remain a free country? The press of England comments upon and criticises the public events of the world. Shall it, for fear of the anger of Louis Napoleon, be prevented from criticising his words and his acts, his breaches of faith, and his outrages against the liberties of his countrymen? If it be for the interest of civilisation throughout the world, as his Lordship alleges, and as every sober-minded politician will admit, that Great Britain and France should remain on terms of amity with each other, it is equally evident that the man who enslaves France, and prevents the expression of that free public opinion which is the surest bond of the cordiality and good understanding of nations, and not the press, which, in the interest of the French people and of the great cause of civilisation, animadverts with great severity upon his treachery and tyranny, is the great impediment to a right understanding between the nations, and the real fomenter of war and of warlike ideas. Between constitutional England and a military despot reigning in Paris there never can be cordiality, however desirable it might be. There can be no real peace in Europe as long as Louis Napoleon is what he is, and surrounds and supports himself by a greedy, unscrupulous, and overwhelming army. That the English press, for the base fear of offending such a man as this, should consent to muzzle itself, and abdicate its high prerogative and privilege, would, indeed, be a national disgrace.

Come the eleventh plague rather than this should be—
Come sink us rather in the sea!

Let the Government, as is its duty, avoid the expresion of hostility to the French Government, though Lord John Russell, by a strange fatality, has, by dismissing Lord Palmerston, done the very thing which he reproaches the press for, let the press, as is its duty also, express itself with the liberty which is our boast and our safety, upon the acts of those who temporarily rule the destinies of that generous and long-suffering nation. The English people and the English press have no feeling of hostility towards the French. On the contrary, they have the keenest sympathy with them, and look with indignation upon the attempt, for the present successful, which has been made to deprive them of the commonest and most sacred rights—earned not alone by their intelligence and refinement, but by the arduous and sanguinary struggles of three generations. As Cowley, in the vigorous poem from which we have already quoted, said of England in his day, we would say of France in ours—

O gracious God! let never more thine hand
Lift up such rod, against the land.
A tyrant is a rod, and serpent too,
And brings worse plagues than Egypt ever knew.
* * * *
What croaking sects and vermin has it sent
Th'unhappy nation to torment;
What greedy troops, what armed power,
Of flies and locusts to devour
The land!

It is because the English people respect the French—it is because they earnestly desire them to be a free, an industrious, and a happy people; and it is because they wish, in the interest of all humanity, to remain in a firm and lasting alliance with them—that they approve of the conduct of the leading organs of public opinion in daily striving to denouncing the unprincipled acts of Louis Napoleon. If Lord John Russell be afraid of the result, we are sorry that he should be so timid; but we hope that he will stand alone in his want of courage. We shall not only grant a safe refuge to exiled men, as his Lordship is willing we should do, but we shall also give a home and allow a tongue to exiled ideas. A successful invasion by the French—an invasion which we are tolerably confident will never be attempted, could scarcely reduce us to a more degrading subjection than Lord John Russell on this one point would impose on us. The public opinion of England will not be fettered, however powerful and however angry the French President may be. In the liberties of this country reside at present the best hopes of Europe. The people of England will speak their minds through the press, come what will of it; and among those who will hereafter have most reason to be grateful for their frankness, will be the people of France. For their sakes, as well as for our own, we shall denounce the unprincipled acts of despotism. Their liberties are too closely connected with our own safety, to render us indifferent.

THE NEW JUDGE.—Mr. Charles Crompton, the wisely-chosen successor of Mr. Justice Patteson, has for many years been one of the most eminent lawyers on the Northern Circuit and in Westminster Hall. He is of a well-known Liverpool family, distinguished for its adhesion to and advocacy of Whig principles. Mr. Crompton was called to the bar in 1821, and has always enjoyed a large amount of what is called junior practice, which in reality is the most learned and laborious part of the profession. He has been for a long time Judge of that important court for the trial of civil actions at Liverpool called the Court of Passage; and no doubt the present popularity and repute of that tribunal are mainly owing to his able and impartial administration of justice He now vacates that appointment; and it is to be seriously hoped that the Government, taught by experience, will be particularly cautious in the choice of an efficient barrister to fill this new vacancy at Liverpool. Some leading and experienced counsel should be selected, without regard to bias, interest, or favour, otherwise the court will be undone.

COURT AND HAUT TON.

OPENING OF PARLIAMENT BY HER MAJESTY.

The Court arrived at Buckingham Palace from Windsor Castle at one o'clock on Monday last. At half-past two her Majesty left Privy Council, which was attended by his Royal Highness Prince Albert, the Lord Chancellor, the Earl of Minto, Lord John Russell, Sir George Grey, Earl Granville, Earl Grey, Sir Charles Wood, Sir Francis Baring, the Earl of Carlisle, the Marquis of Clanricarde, the Right Hon. The Right Hon. Henry Lord Cowley (her Majesty's Ambassador to Paris) and Mr. Justice Patteson were, by command of the Queen, sworn of her Majesty's most honourable Privy Council, and took their seats at the board.

The list of Sheriffs for England and Wales was pricked for by her Majesty.

The Queen's Speech on the opening of the session of Parliament was arranged and agreed upon.

Her Majesty gave audiences to Lord John Russell, the Right Hon. Fox Maule, Sir George Grey, Earl Granville, and Earl Grey.

On Tuesday the Queen went in state to the House of Peers, to open the session of Parliament with a speech from the throne.

The state procession was formed at Buckingham Palace in the following order:—

The first carriage, drawn by a set of bays, conveying three Gentlemen Ushers, Captain Green, Mr. Heneage, and Mr. De Vesci and the Exon of the Yeoman Guard, Captain Phibos.

The second carriage, drawn by a set of bays, conveying the Groom in Waiting to the Queen, Mr. R. Ormsby Gore; the Groom in Waiting to the Prince, Colonel Wylde; and the Pages of Honour in Waiting, Messrs. Gordon and Cameron.

The third carriage, drawn by a set of bays, conveying the Equerry in Waiting to the Queen, Colonel Hon. Charles Grey; the Equerry in Waiting to the Prince, Lieut.-Col. Hon. Arthur Gordon; and the Groom of the Robes, Lieut.-Colonel Francis Hugh Seymour.

The fifth carriage, drawn by a set of bays, conveying the Lord in Waiting to the Queen, Lord Waterpark; the Lord in Waiting to the Prince, Lord George Lennox; and the Treasurer of the Household, Lord Marcus Hill.

The sixth carriage, drawn by a set of black horses, conveying the Lady of the Bedchamber in Waiting, the Marchioness of Douro; the Lord Steward, the Marquis of Westminster; and the Gold Stick in Waiting, the Marquis of Londonderry, K.C.B.

The State coach, drawn by eight cream-coloured horses, conveying her Majesty the Queen, his Royal Highness Prince Albert, K.G.; the Mistress of the Robes, the Duchess of Sutherland; and the Master of the Horse, the Duke of Norfolk, K.G.

The Royal procession quitted the Palace at ten minutes before two o'clock, escorted by a detachment of the Life Guards.

Her Majesty and Prince Albert and the Royal cortège returned to Buckingham Palace at five minutes past five o'clock. The Lord Chamberlain, the Vice-Chamberlain, and the Master of the Household received the Queen and Prince on their return.

At four o'clock the Court returned to Windsor Castle, travelling by a special train on the Great Western Railway

Her Majesty and the Prince Consort are continuing their hospitalities. Yesterday (Friday) the play of "King John" was represented in the Rubens Room, in the presence of a distinguished audience.

POLITICAL BANQUETS.

The commencement of the Parliamentary session was heralded on Monday last by political banquets given by the three great leaders, the Marquis of Lansdowne, Lord John Russell, and the Earl of Derby. Lord Lansdowne's party was given to a circle of forty Peers, supporters of the present Government, including the mover and seconder of the Address. The noble Marquis was too unwell, from a sudden attack of gout, to be present at the dinner, and the chair at the table were shared by his son, the Earl of Shelburne, and his son-in-law, the Hon. J. K. Howard. After dinner her Majesty's gracious Speech on the opening of Parliament was read to the guests.

Lord John Russell's dinner was given at the Premier's official residence in Downing-street to a large party of members of the Lower House, including the mover and seconder of the Address in the Commons.

The Earl of Derby, as the head of the country party, entertained a distinguished circle of Opposition Peers at his mansion in St. James's-square, including the Dukes of Rutland, Beaufort, Montrose, Northumberland, and Cleveland, the Marquises of Exeter and Salisbury; the Earl of Eglinton and Jardwicke, &c. The noble Earl's table presented a magnificent display of gold and silver plate. The centre piece was a superb gold centre-piece, presented to his Lordship's father as Lord-Lieutenant of Lancashire; and upon this he has worn several beautiful pieces of racing plate won at Goodwood and Doncaster by the late Premier. On this occasion a dessert service of the most superb description, manufactured by Messrs. Daniell, of New Bond-street, and purchased out of the Great Exhibition, was used for the first time, and greatly admired

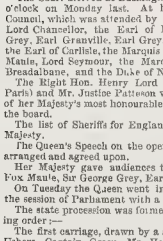
The Countess Grey's reception on Monday evening was honoured with the presence of a very brilliant circle of the aristocracy.

The Marquis of Bath has arrived in Paris from a tour in the East. His Lordship will come of age on the first of the ensuing month, when the event will be celebrated by the usual rejoicings on his Lordship's estates in the counties of Wilts and Somerset.

M. Thiers has returned to town from visiting Lord Ashburton at the Grange, near Alresford.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.

SIR ROBERT GRAHAM, BART., OF ESK, COUNTY CUMBERLAND



THIS venerable Baronet, whose death occurred a few days since, at the age of 82, was the male representative of a distinguished branch of the border family of Graham. He was the great-grandson, Sir Richard Graham, of Esk, gentleman of the Horse to King James I., was created a Baronet, 24th March, 1629. He subsequent y purchased Netherby, of Francis Earl of Cumberland, and became, at the outbreak of the great Civil War, a gallant Cavalier commander. At Edgehill he was particularly distinguished, and was so severely wounded as to be left among the slain for an entire night. His grandson, Sir Richard, third Baronet, Ambassador at the Court of France, was advanced, in 1680, to the Viscounty of Preston, and was succeeded by his son, the second Viscount, Charles, whose aunt and cousin, Lady Widdrington, devised the family estates to the Hon. Robert Graham, Esq., grandfather of the present Right Hon. Sir James Graham, Bart., M.P. The ancient barony reverted, however, to the heir male, the Rev. William Graham, whose son was the gentleman whose death we record.

Sir Robert was born 1st October, 1765, and married, 25th April, 1810, Elizabeth, only daughter of John Young, Esq., of Battle, by whom he had six sons and five daughters. The eldest survivor of the former is now Sir Edward Graham, ninth Baronet of Esk.

At one time the late Sir Robert Graham put in a claim to the Earldom of Annandale and Hartfel.

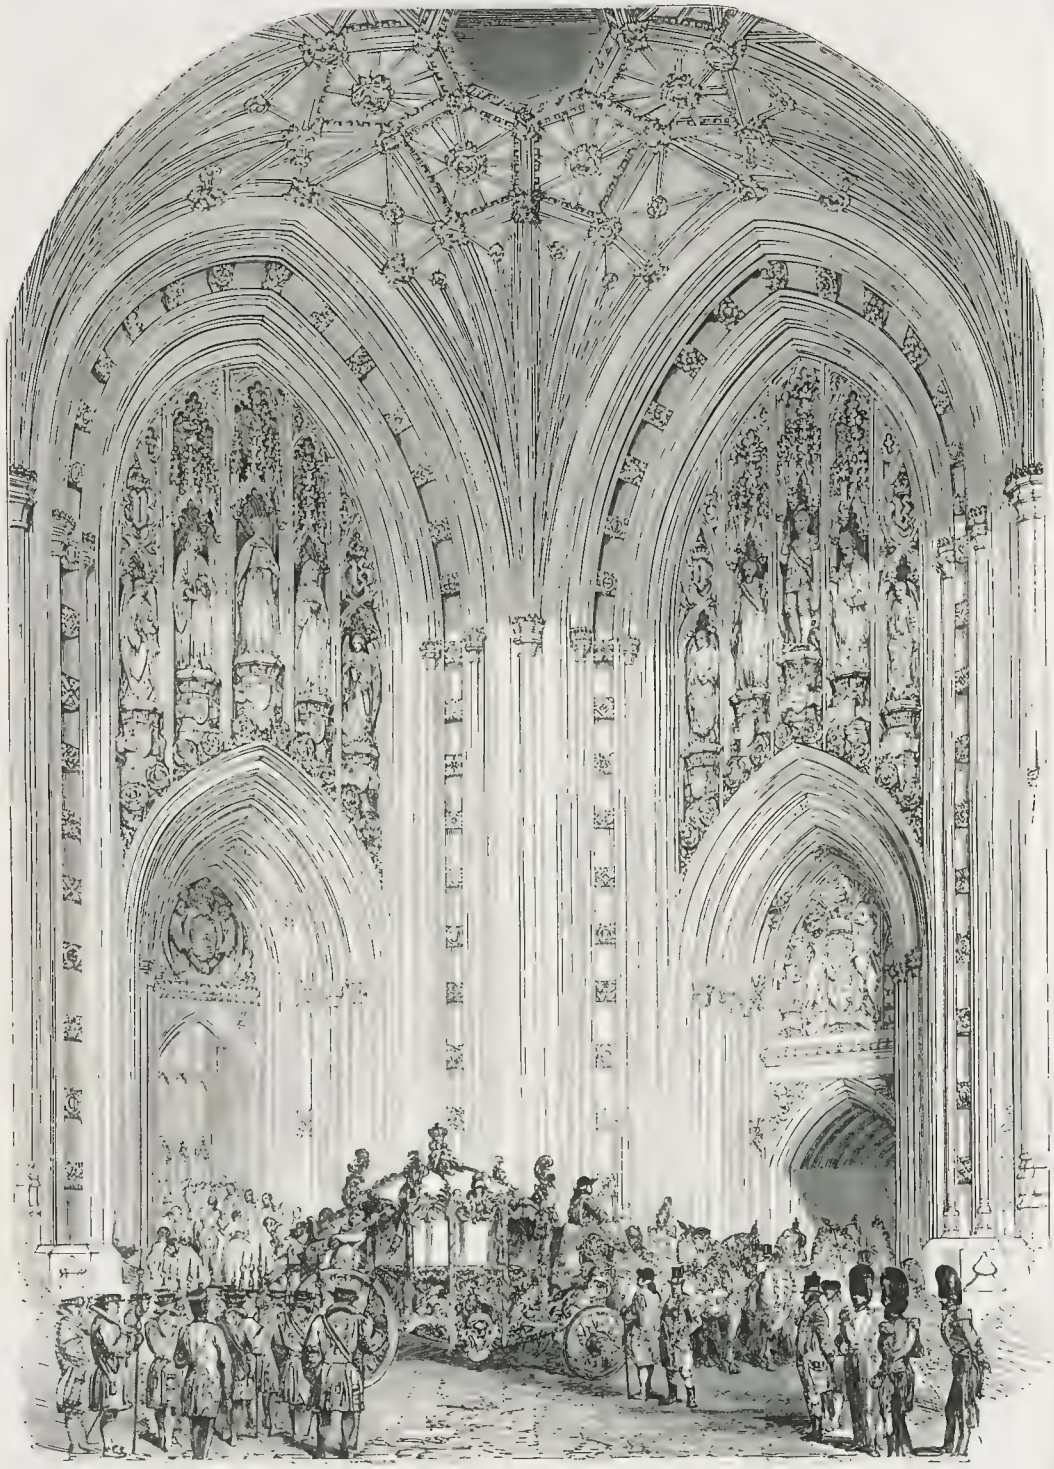
DYMOKE WELLES, ESQ., OF GREBBY HALL, COUNTY LINCOLN.

THE death of this gentleman took place on the 2d inst. He was the eldest surviving son of the late Dymoke Welles, of Grebby Hall, who claimed, in 1819, the Barony of Marmion, and represented a branch of the family of Dymoke, in which is vested the hereditary office of Champion of England. Mr. Dymoke Welles married, Anne, was daughter and coheir of Thomas Warrington, Esq., of Beckingham Hall, High Sheriff of Notts in 1797, by Anne Hurt, his wife, coheir of her uncle, Eastland Hawksmore, Esq., having died without issue, he succeeded to the heirship of his family by his brother, Edward Lionel Welles, Esq., of the Grange, West Molesey, Surrey, and of Upper Broadstone, Grosvenor-square. In 1839 Mr. Dymoke Welles petitioned the Crown to terminate the abeyance of the Barony of Kyme in his favour.

RICHARD ALFRED DAVENPORT.

THIS ingenious literateur died on Sunday week, at his residence, Brunswick Cottage, Park street, Camberwell, in his 72d year. Mr. Davenport wrote, for Whittingham's 100 vol. edition of the "British Poets," the biographical notices and critical prefaces. He wrote considerable portions of the history, biography, geography, and criticism in Arrington's "Annual Register" for the years 1792 to 1797. He is also the author of a "History of Greece," 3 vols.; a "Boy's school of Geography," and several volumes of the "Family Library." As editor or more than 100 volumes of miscellaneous works (among which is the "Poetical Register," in 9 volumes, containing contributions from eminent poets, and hitherto unpublished, original and translated, from his own pen), he has written innumerable articles on biography, poetry, criticism, &c. In 1830, his friend Mr. Britton wrote of Mr. Davenport:—"His laborious, critical, and classical author is scarcely known to the public, nor even to the of the literary present time. A devoted student and lover of books, he has lived in the midst of those fascinating companions, and has neglected to cultivate an intimacy with the world, which was much."

OPENING OF PARLIAMENT



HER MAJESTY'S ARRIVAL AT THE VICTORIA TOWER.

In several Numbers of the tenth volume of our Journal, we gave Views of the gorgeous and stately chamber fitted up for the Lords in Parliament assembled, with representations of the corridors, &c., then finished, and the progress towards completion of the new Palace at Westminster. The assembling for the first time of her Majesty's "faithful Commons," on Tuesday, in their more simply decorated yet scarcely less beautiful House, suggests to us the pleasing duty of resuming our Illustration and description of this the most remarkable building of the present century.

The Views we this week give comprise representations of the Royal Entrance in the Victoria Tower; the Royal Staircase; the Entrance from the Queen's Robing-room into the Royal Gallery; and the Interior of the House of Commons.

The Royal entrance in the Victoria Tower is probably one of the most striking and effective portions of the new Palace of Westminster. The loftiness of the vaulted groining, the rich and varied bosses at its intersections, the canopied niches over the doors, and the exquisite variety of the details, all unite in producing a charming whole.

The Victoria Tower is placed at the south-west angle of the new Palace, there being two lofty arches on the south and west sides, as entrances. Entering beneath the Tower, the Royal gateway is on the north side, and consists of a beautiful archway deeply recessed, having within it a lesser archway, serving as the doorway. Over this is a panel containing the Royal arms, supported by angels, very elaborately sculptured. Above the outer arch the wall is panelled into five divisions, the three central ones having in them very beautiful niches, containing figures of the Queen, Justice, and Mercy, standing on short pedestals, bearing shields charged with devices, and further enriched with labels, &c.; and the two outer divisions are filled with angels holding labels. Round the outer edge of the arch is a peculiarly rich cresting of roses and leaves. On the eastern side the wall is divided, similarly to the northern, into a lofty arch containing a dwarf arch deeply recessed, which leads into a long and narrow passage communicating with the Royal court, where the state carriages wait during the Queen's stay in the House of Lords. Over this dwarf archway the Royal arms and the crest of the Prince of Wales are the decoration. There are five divisions on the main portion of the wall exactly corresponding to those on the north wall, three of them containing figures of St. George, St. Patrick, and St. Andrew, standing on pedestals bearing the respective crosses used as their symbols; and the remaining two, angels holding shields bearing the Royal arms. The rose cresting adorns this as well as the other arch, and bosses of the utmost variety of design fill the hollow of the jambs in both the great arches.

THE NEW HOUSE OF COMMONS.

The House of Commons is 90 feet in length, 45 feet in breadth, and 45 in height, and surrounded by galleries, which diminish its apparent size. The height of the House and the form of the roof are materially altered from Mr. Barry's original design; but though shorn of its loftiness, it is a magnificent and imposing apartment. The view we give of the House is taken from the bar, looking towards the Speaker's chair, and includes about one-half the length of the House. The ceiling is divided longitudinally into three parts, the centre division being horizontal, the others inclined downwards; and these longitudinal sections are divided by massive ribs, resting on corbels, into square compartments, which are again divided, the horizontal into sixteen, and the other compartments into twenty, small square panels; and on these are painted alternately a rose and a portcullis within floreated circles. The massive ribs are carved along the sides with a very elaborate and beautiful label pattern. The corbels rest on elegantly enriched shafts, springing from brackets having shields supported by lions sculptured upon them; and these are placed on the level of the lower part of the windows. The walls from beneath the windows to the galleries are panelled, the paneling being crested with a very beautiful brattishing.

On the east and west sides of the House there are six windows, and at the north and south ends there are three compartments to correspond with the fenestral arrangement of the sides; and these spaces are filled with a very pretty latticework of wrought brass forming a screen to the ladies' galleries. The windows are filled with rich stained glass, displaying the armorial insignia of twenty-four of the English boroughs.

The galleries are particularly effective specimens of design in Gothic wood-work; and, with their tendrils and trefoil ornament of wrought brass, are extremely fine. The side galleries are for the use of members of the House, and each contains two rows of seats. The northern gallery is for the use of the Reporters, and to it there is a separate staircase and retiring-rooms. The southern gallery is divided into two portions, one being for distinguished visitors, the other for such of the public as may be fortunate to obtain admission; and to each of these portions there are separate staircases. The galleries are supported by pillars, and underneath, forward to the wall, they are covered with panels of wainscot leather, harmonising delightfully with the warm brown tints of the oak panelling and framing to the seats, produces an air of cosiness and comfort absolutely provoking. The Clerks' table is panelled beneath with elaborately carved work, and at its southern end are brass scrolls for the Speaker's mace to rest on when the business of the House is in committee.

The Serjeant-at-Arms' seat is near the bar, at the southern end of the House. There are two doors on either side of the House, to lead into the division lobbies—very beautiful apartments, which we shall illustrate in a future Number; and there are similar doorways as entrances into the galleries. Behind the Speaker's chair is a doorway leading to retiring-rooms for the Speaker, and communicating with corridors which will give access to the Speaker's official residence, when it is completed. Of the great entrances—the Members' Entrance, the House Lobby, &c.—we purpose giving Views and descriptions.

The ventilation of the House of Commons is on Dr. Reid's principle. The fresh warm air passing upwards through the perforated floor, and the vitiated air escaping through the ceiling into an air-shaft, its exit being provided for by the panels of the ceiling not resting on the intersecting ribs, and allowing a space of about three-quarters of an inch between the ribs and the panels. The House is lighted by chandeliers of bronze and brass hanging from pendents at the intersections of the great beams of the ceiling; and a specimen of these is the subject of one of our Engravings. The chandeliers are for gas, and they are on Faraday's principle, which we explained in Vol. X., when describing the House of Lords. In our view of the House the chandeliers are shown as hanging at their usual places; but they can be lowered by machinery in an upper chamber almost to the level of the first row of seats in the body.

THE ROYAL STAIRCASE.

The Royal Staircase is entered from the Victoria Tower, and is a very beautiful one. There are three flights of eight stairs each, leading to a vestibule of exquisite beauty, having clustered columns, supporting a very elegantly-groined roof, with bosses of great variety of design at the intersections of the ribs. Groups of pedestals are at the bases of the columns, and these are intended for statues at some future period. In this vestibule there are doors of entrance into the Queen's Robing-room. This latter was temporarily fitted up for the occasion; but will, when completed, be furnished and decorated in the richest manner

In our Engraving of the Queen entering the Royal Gallery, the statues represented on either side of the door were merely placed there for the occasion; for, though there will be statues in the niches, as yet no commissions have been issued for them

The several passages, offices, and committee-rooms are laid with Gough and Co.'s indiarubber floor-cloth; and the Victoria tower with their indiarubber pavement.

THE ROBING-ROOM.

The Robing-room is a lofty and spacious apartment, with a canopied throne (a temporary erection) at the further end, opposite to which is the only pictorial illustration the apartment has yet received, Mr. Dyce's fresco, from the "Legend of King Arthur." There are two doors to this room, one close upon the porch, the other near the throne; and the Majesty, entering at the former, comes forth at the latter into a noble hall, 110 feet long, 45 wide, and 45 h gh. This is called the Royal Gallery, and will be decorated with frescoes illustrative of the history of England, with windows filled with stained glass, and with rich decoration in gilding and heraldry. This hall afforded to great numbers of her Majesty's subjects an admirable opportunity of viewing the procession to and from the House of Lords, rows of seats rising one above another being placed on each side, and their occupants were all contributing greatly to the interesting character of the scene. The Royal Gallery was opened on Tuesday for the first time; it leads to the magnificent apartment immediately behind the throne, and of which we gave Illustrations in our tenth Volume.

To Mr. Barry are due our best thanks for the ready access he has given our Artists to the whole of the New Palace, for the purpose of making the Sketches for our Journal; and our thanks are also due to Mr. Quarm, the clerk of the works, for much information received from him.
